DIALOGUE

Treating of the

JUS, OR RIGHT,

Which the KINGS of Scotland have for exercifing their Royal Power.

George Buchanan, AUTHOR.

George Buchanan to King James, the fixth of that name King of Scots, wisheth all health and happiness.

Wrote feveral years ago, when amongst us affairs were very turbulent, a Dialogue of the right of the Scots Kings, wherein I endeavoured to explain from the very beginning (if I may fo fag) what right, or what authority both Kings and People have one with another. Which Book, when for that time it feemed fomewhat profitable, as shutting the mouths of some, who more by importunate clamours at that time, than what was right, inveighed against the course of affairs, requiring they might be levelled according to the rule of right reafon; but matters being somewhat more peaceable, I also having laid down my Arms, very willingly devoted my self to publick concord. Now having lately fallen upon that diffutation, which I found among it my Papers, and perceiving therein many things which might be necessary for your Age (especially you being placed in that part of humane affairs) I thought cood

good to publish it, that it might be a standing witness of mine affection towards you, and admonifs you of your duty towards your Subjects. Now many things perswaded me that this my endeavour should not be in vain: Especially your Age not yet corrupted by prave opinions, and inclination far above your Tears for undertaking all Heroical and noble attempts, spontaneously making haste thereunto, and not only your promptitude in obeying your Instructors and Governours, but all such as give you found admonition, and your Judgment and Diligence in examining Affairs, so that no mans Authority can have m ch weight with you, unlefs it be confirmed by probable reason. I do perceive alfo, that you by a certain natural instinct do fo much abbor flattery, which is the Nurse of Tyranny, and a most grievous plague of a Kingdom, so as you do hate the Court Solecifms and Barbarifms no lefs, than those that scem to cen-Sure all elegancy, do love and effect such things, and everywhere in difcourfe spread abroad, as the Sames thereof, these Titles of Majesty, Highness, and many other unsavoury compellations. Now albeit your good natural diposition, and sound instructions, wherein you have been principled, may at present draw you away from falling into this Error, yet I am forced to be fomewhat jealous of you, left bad company, the famning foster-mother of all vices, draw afide your foft and tender mind into the worst part ; especially seeing I am not ignorant, how easily our other fenfes yeild to feduction. This Book therefore I have fent unto you to be not only your monitor, but also an importunate and bold Exactor, which in this your tender and flexible years may conduct you in sufery from the rocks of flattery, and not only may admonifs you, but also keep you in the way you are once entred into : And if at any time you deviate, it may reprehend and draw you back, the which if you obey, you shall for your filf and for all yor Subjects acquire Tranquility and Peace in this life, and Eternal Glory in the Life to come. Have-prefumed to trouble your attention with the Ceremony of a Preface, the end and defign of which is not to usher in my Translation to the World with curious embellishments of Oratory (that ferving only to gratifie, or enchaunt a Luxuriant fancy) but allennarly to Apologize for it, in cafe, a Zoilus, or a Momus, shall happen to peruse the fame. Briefly, then I reduce all that either of these will (as I humbly perceive) object against this my work, to these two Generals, Prevarication and Ignorance. First, they will call me a prevaricator or prevaricating Interpreter, and that upon two accounts. First, Becaufe I have (fay they) fophifticated the genuine fence and meaning of the learned Author, by interpreting and foifting in spurious words of mine own. Secondly, That I have quite alienated the literal fence in other places by a too Paraphrastical exposition. To the first lanswer, that none are ignorant, that the Original of this piece is a Lofty Laconick stile of Latin: Now I once having undertaken Provinciam Interpretis, behoved to render my interpretation fomewhat plain and obvious, which I could never do in fome places, without adding fome words (Claritatis gratia) but always I fought out the fcope (as far as my (hallow capacity could reach) and fuited them thereunto. Wherein I am hopeful, that no ingenuous impartial Reader not prepoffeffed with prejudice against the matter contained in the Original, and confequently against the Translation thereof, will find much matter of quarrel upon that account, if he will but take an overly view of the Original, and and fo compare the Translation therewith. For I have been very fparing in adding ought of my own. To the fecond branch of the first Challenge I answer briefly; there are none who have the least smartering of common sence, but know well enough, that it is morally impossible for an Interpreter to make good Language of any Latine piece, if he shall alwayes verbum verbo reddere; I mean, if he adhere so close to the very rigour of the Original, as to think it illicite to use any Paraphrase, although the successful and furmary comprehensiveness of the Original Stile even cry aloud for it, as it were; but to filence in a word these Critical Snarlers, where ever I have used any Paraphrase, I likewise have set down the exposition ad verbum (to the best of my knowledge) as near as I could.

The Second Challenge is of Ignorance, and that becaufe I have paffed by fome Latine verfes of Seneca, which are at the end of this Dialogue, containing the Stoicks defcription of a King, without Translating them into English. Now, true it is, I have done fo, not becaufe I knew not how to interpret them (for I hope, Candid Readers at least will not fo judge of me) but becaufe I thought it not requisite to meddle with them, unless I could have put as specious a lustre upon them, as my Pen would have pulled off them (for otherwife I would have greatly injured them) which could never be done without a fublime Vein of Poefie, wherein I ingenuously profess ignorance : fo that if the last Challenge be thus understood, transfeat because

Nec fonte labra prolui Cabalino,

Nec in bicipiti somniasse Parnasso,

Memini, ut repente sic Poeta prodirem.

And hence it is, that all the Latin Verses, which occur in this Dialogue, are by me Translated into Profe, as the reft: But I fear I have wearied your Patience too long already, and therefore I will go no further, I wish you satisfaction in the Book, and so

Vive & Vale.

A DI-

A DIALOGUE Concerning that JUS or RIGHT OF GOVERNMENT Amongst the RSONS PE GEORGE BUCHANAN

And THOMAS MAITLAND.

Homas Maitland being of late returned home from France, and I ferioufly enquiring of him the state of Affairs there, began (for the love I bear to him) to exhort him to continue in that course he had taken to honour, and to entertain that excellent hope in the progress of his Studies. For if I, being but of an ordinary spirit, and almost of no fortune, in an illiterate Age, have fo wreltled with the iniquity of the times, as that I feem to have dome formewhat : then certainly they who are born in a more happy Age, and who have maturity of Years, Wealth and Pregnancy of Spirit, ought not to be deterred by pains from noble deligns, nor can fuch delpair being affifted by fo many helps. They fhould therefore go on with vigour to illustrate learning, and to commend themselves and those of their Nation to the memory of after Ages and pofferity. Yea if they would but beftir themfelves herein scmewhat actively, it might come to pass, that they would eradicate out of Mensminds that opinion, that Men in the cold regions of

of the World, are at as great diftance from Learning, Humanity and all Endowments of the Mind, as they are diftant from the Sun. For as Nature hath granted to the Africans, Egyptians, and many other Na. tions more fubtile motions of the Mind, and a greater sharpnels of Wit, yet the hath not altogether to far caft off any Nation, as to thut up from it an entry to Vertue and Honour. Hereupon, whilft he did speak meanly of of himfelf (which is his modelty) but of me more affectionally than truely: at last the tract of discourse drew us on so far, that when he had asked me concerning the troubled state of our Country, and I had answered him as far as I judged convenient for that time; I began by courfe to ask him, what was the opinion of the French's or other Nations with whom he had conversed in France, concerning our Affairs ? For I did not queftion, but that the novelty of Affairs (as is usual) would give occcasionand matter of difcourse thereof to all. Why (faith he) do you defire that of me? For feeing you are well acquainted with the courfe of Affairs, and is not ignorant what the most part of men do speak, and what they think. You may eafily guess in your own Confcience, what is, or at least should be the Opinion of all. B. But, the further that foreign Nations are at a distance, they have the less causes of Wrath, Hatred, Love and other Perturbations, which may divert the Mind from Truth, and for the most part they fo much the more judge of things finderely, and freely speak out what they think: that very freedom of fpeaking and conferring the thoughts of the Heart doth draw forth many obfcure things, difcovers intricacies, confirms doubts and may flop the Mouth of wicked men, and teach fuch as are weak. M. Shall I be ingenuous with you? B. Why not? M.A. though I had a great defire after fo long a time, to visit my native Country, Parents, Relations and Friends, yet nothing did fo much inflame my defire, as the clamour of a rude multitude : For albeit I thought my fell well enough fortified either by my own constant Practice, or the moral precepts of the most Learned, yet when I came to fall upon the present cafe, I know not how I could conceal my Pufilanimity. For when that horrid villany not long fince here perpetrated all with one voice did abominate it the Author hereof not being known; the multitude, which is more acted by precipitancy, than ruled by deliberation, did eharge the fault, of fome few upon all; and the common hatred of a particular crime did redound to the whole Nation, fo that even fuch as were most remote from any fufpicion were inflamed with the infamy of other mens crimes. When therefore this florm of calumny was calmed, I betook my felf very willingly into this port, wherein notwithstanding I am afraid, I may dash upon a Rock. B. Why, I pray you? M. Because the atrociousness of that that late crime doth feem fo much to inflame the Minds of all already exafperated, that now no place of Apology is left. For, how fhall I be able to fultain the impetuous affaults, not only of the weaker fort, but alfo of those who seem to be more fagacious, who will exclaim against us, that we were content with the flaughter of an harmles Youth, an unheard of cruelty, unlefs we fhould fhew another new example of atrocious cruelty against Women, which fex very Enemies do spare when Cities are taken by force. Now from what villany will' any dignity or Majefty deter those, who thus rage against Kings? or what place for mercy will they leave, whom neither the weakness of Sex, nor innocency of Age will reftrain? Equity, Cuftom, Laws, the refpect to Soveraignty Reverence of lawful Magiltracy, which henceforth they will either retain for fhame, or coerce for fear, when the power of supream Authority is exposed to the ludibry of the baseft of the People, the difference of equity and iniquity, of honefty and difhonefty being once taken away, almost by a publick confent, there is a degeneracy into cruel barbarity. 'I know I fhall hear these and more atrocious then these spoken so soon as I shall return into France again; all mens Ears in the mean time being thut from admitting any Apology or fatisfaction. B. But I shall ealily liberate you of this fear, and our Nation from that falle crime. For, if they do fo much deteft the atrociousness of the first crime, how can they rationally reprehend feverity in revenging it? or if they take it ill, that the Queen is taken order with, they mult needs approve the first deed; choose you then, which of the two would you have to feem cruel. For neither they nor you can praife or reproach both, provided you understand your felves. M.I do indeed abhor and deteft the Kings Murther, and am glad that the Nation is free of that guilt, and that it is charged upon the wickedness of fome few. But this laft fact I can neither allow or difallow; for it feems to me a famous and memorable deed, that by countel and diligence they have fearched out that Villany, which fince the Memory of Man is the most hainous, and do pursue the perpretrators in a hostile manner. But in that they have taken order with the chief. Magistrate, and put contempt upon Soveraignty, which amongst all Nations hath been always accounted great and facred. I know not how all the Nations of Europe will relifhit, especially such as live under Kingly Government; surely the Greatness and Novelty of the fact doth put me to a demur, albeit I am not ignorant what may be pretended on the contrary and fo much the rather, becaule fome of the Actors are of my intimate Acquaintance. B. Now I almost perceive, that it doth perhaps not trouble you fo much, as those of forreign Nations, who would be judges of the Vertues of others to whom you

you think fatisfaction must be given. Of these I shall set down three forts especially, who will vehemently enveigh against that deed. The first kind is most pernicious, wherein those are, who have mancipated themselves to the lufts of Tyrants, and think every thing just and lawful for them to do, wherein they may gratifie Kings, and measure every thing not as it is in it felf, but by the luft of their Masters. Such have to devoted themselves to the lusts of others, that they have left to themselves no liberty either to speak or do. Out of this Crew have proceeded thofe, who have most cruelly Murthered that Innocent Youth, without any caufe of Enmity, but through hope of gain, Honour and Power at Court to fatisfie the luft of others. Now whilft fuch feign to be forry for the Queens cafe, they are not grieved for Her misfortunes, but look for their own fecurity, and take very ill to have the reward of their molt Hainous Crime, (which by hope they twallowed down) to be pulled out of their Throat. I judge therefore that this kind of Men should not be fatisfied fo much by reafoning, as chaftifed by the feverity of Laws. and force of Arms. Others again are all for themselves; these Men. though otherwife not Malicious, are not grieved for the publick Calamity (as they would feem to be) but for their own Domestick damages, and therefore they feem to fland in need rather of fome comfort, than of the remedies of perfwafive reafoning and Laws. The reft is the rude multitude, which doth admire at all Novelties, reprehend many things, and think nothing is right, but what they themselves do or see done : For how much any thing done doth decline from an Ancient Cuftome, fo far they think it is fallen from Juffice and Equity. And becaufe these be not led by Malice and Envy, nor yet by Self-interest, the most part will admit Information, and to be weaned from their Error, fo that being convinced by the ftrength of reason, they yield: Which in the matter of Religion, we find by experience very often in these days, and have also found it in preceding Ages. There is almost no man to wild, that cannot be tamed, if he will but patiently hearken to instruction.

M. Stirely we have found oftentimes that very true. B. When you therefore deal with this kind of people fo clamorous and very importunate, ask fome of them, what they think concerning the punifhment of Caligula, Nero or Domitian, I think there will be none of them to addicted to the name King, that will not confefs, they were juftly punifhed. M. Perhaps you fay right, but thefe very fame men will forthwith cry out, that they complain not of the punifhment of Tyrants, but are grieved at the fad Calamities of Lawful Kings. B Do you not then perceive how eafily the People may be pacified? M. Not indeed, unlefs you you fay some other thing. B. But I shall caule you understand it in few words, the People (you fay) approve the Murther of Tyrants, but compassionate the misfortune of Kings, would they not then change their Opinion, if they clearly understood what the difference is betwixt a Tyrant and a King? do you not think that this might come to pais, as. in many other cafes? M. If all would confess that Tyrants are justly killed, we might have a large entry made open to us for the reft, but I find fome men, and these not of small Authority, who while they make Kings liable to the penalties of the Laws, yet they will maintain Tyrants to be Sacred perfons; but certainly by a prepofterous judgment, if I be not miltaken, yet they are ready to maintain their Government, albeit immoderate and inrolerable, as if they were to Fight for things both Sacred and Civil. B. I have allo met with feveral perfons oftentimes, who maintain the fame very pertinacioufly; but whether that opinion be right or not, we shall further discuss it hereafter at better conveniency. In the mean time, if you please, let us conclude upon this, upon condition, that unless hereafter it be not sufficiently confirmed unto you, you may have liberty to retract the fame. M. On these terms indeed I will not refuse it. B. Let us then conclude these two to be contraries, a King and a Tyrant. M. Be it fo. B. He therefore that shall explain the Original and Caufe of Creating Kings, and what the duties of Kings are towards their People, and of People towards their Kings, will he not feem to have almost explained on the other hand, what doth pertain to the nature of a Tyrant. M. I think fo. B. The reprefentation then of both being laid out, do you not think that the People will understand alfo, what their duty is towards both? M. It is very like they will. B. Now contrariwife, in things that are very unlike to one another, which yet are contained under the fame Genus, there may be fome fimilitudes, which may eafily induce imprudent Perfons into an Error. M. Doubtlefs, there may be fuch, and efpecially in the fame kind, where that which is the worft of the two dath eafily perfonate the beft of both, and ftudies nothing more, than to impose the same upon such as are ignorant. Buc. Have you not some representation of a King and of a Tyrant impreffed in your mind? For if you have it, you will fave me much pains. M. Indeed I could eafily express what Idea I have of both in my mind, but I fear, it may be rude and without form, therefore, I rather defire to hear what your opinion is, left whilst you are a refuting me, our discourse become more prolix, you being both in Age and Experience above me; and are well acquainted, not only with the Opinions of others, but alfo have feen the Cuftoms of many, and their Cities. B. I shall then do ir, it, and that very willingly, yet will I not unfold my own Opinion fo much, as that of the Ancients, that thereby a greater Authority may be given to my difcourfe, as not being fuch as is made up with respect to this time, but taken out of the Opinions of those, who not being concerned in the present controversie, have no less eloquently than briefly given their judgment, without Hatred, Favour, or Envy, whole Cafe was far from these things; and their Opinions I shall especially make use of, who have not friviloufly triffed away their time, but by vertue and counfel have flourished both at home and abroad in well governed Commonwealths. But before I produce theie witneffes, I would ask you fome few things, that feeing we are at accord in fome things of no fmall importance, there may be no necessity to digress from the purpose in hand, nor to flay in explaining or confirming things that are perfpicuous and well known. M. I think we fhould do fo, and if you pleafe ask me. B. Do you not think that the time hath been, when men did dwell in Cottages, yea and in Caves, and as strangers did wander to and fro without Laws, or certain dwelling places, and did Affemble together as their fond humours did lead them, or as fome Commodity, and common utility did allure them? M. forfooth I believe that; feeing it is confonant to the course and order of Nature, and is testified by all the Histories of all Nations almost, for Homer doth discribe the representation of such a Wild and Barbarous kind of life in Sicily, even in the time of the Trojans. Their Courts (faith he) do neither abound with Councils nor Judges, they dwell only in darkfome Caves, and every one of them in high mountains ruleth his own House, Wife and Children, nor is any of them at leifure to Communicate his Domestick affairs to any other. About the fame time alfo Italy is faid to be no better civilized, as we may eafily conjecture from the most fertile regions almost of the whole World, how great a folitude and wastness there were in places on this lide of Italy. B. But whether do you think the vagrant and folitary life, or the Affociations of men civily incorporate, most agreeable to nature? M. The last without all peradventure, which utility the Mother almost of justice and equity did first convocate; and commanded to give figns or warnings by found of Trumpet, and to defend themfelves within Walls and to fhut the Gates with one Key. B. But, do you think that utility was the first and main caufe of the affociation of Men ? M. Why not, feeing I have heard from the learned, that men are Born for men. B. Utility indeed to fome feens to be very efficacious, both in begetting and conferving the publick Society of Mankind; but if I miltake not, there is a far more venerable, or ancient caule of mens affociating, and a more Ante. cedaneous cedaneous and Sacred bond of their Civil Community, otherwife, if every one would have a regard to his own private advantage, then furely that. very utility would rather diffolve than unite humane fociety together. M. Perhaps that may be true, therefore I defire to know what other caufe you will affign. B. A certain inflit. Et of nature, not only in Man, but alfo in the more tamed fort of Beafls, that although these allurements of utility be not in them, yet do they of their own accord flock together with other Bealts of their own kind. Eut of these others we have no ground of debate? Surely we fee this inflinct by nature fo deeply rooted in Man, that if any one had the affluence of all things, which contribute either for maintaining health, or pleasure and delight of the mind, yet he will think his life unpleafant without humane converfe. Yea, they who out of a defire of knowledge, and an endeavour of investigating the truth, have withdrawn themselves from the multitude, and retired to secret corners, could not long endure a perpetual vexation of mind, nor, if at any time they fhould remit the fame, could they live in folitude, but very willingly did bring forth to light their very fecret fludies, and as they had laboured for the publick good, they did communicate to all the fruit of their labour. But if there be any man who doth wholly take delight in folitude, and flee from converse with men, and shun it, I judge it doth rather proceed from a diftemper of the mind, than from any inftinct of nature, fuch as we have heard of Timon the Athenian, and Bellerophon the Corunthian, who (as the Poet faith) was a wandring wretch on the Elean Coafts, eating his own Heart, and fleeing the very Foot-steps of Men. M. I do not in this much diffent from you, but there is one word Nature here fet down by you, which I do often use rather out of Custome, than that I understand it, and is by others fo variously taken, and accommodated to fo many things, that for the most part I am at a stand to what I may mainly apply it. B. Forfooth at prefent I would have no other thing to be understood thereby, than that light infused by God into our minds, for when God formed that Creature more facred, and capable of a Celeftial mind, and which might have dominion over the other Creatures, he gave not only Eyes to his Body, whereby he might evite things contrary to his condition, and follow after fuch as might be uleful, but alfo he produced in his mind a certain light, whereby he might differn things filthy from honeft; this light fome call Nature, others the Law of Nature, for my own part, truly I think it is of a heavenly stamp, and I am fully perfwaded, that Nature doth never fay one thing, and Wifdom another. Moreover, God hath given us an abridgment of that Law, which might contain the whole in few words, viz. That we should love С .

love him with all our Soul, and our neighbours as our felves, all the Books of Holy Scripture which Treat of ordering our Conversation, do contain nothing elfe but an explication of this Law. M. You think then that no Orator or Lawyer, who might congregate difperfed men, hath been the Author of humane Society, but God only? B. It is fo indeed, and with Cicero, I think there is nothing done on Earth more acceptable to the great God, who rules the World, than the affociations of men-legally united, which are called Civil Incorporations, whose feveral parts must be as compactly joyned together, as the several Members of our Body, and every one must have their proper function, to the end there may be a mutual Cooperating for the good of the whole, and a mutual propelling of injuries, and a forefeeing of advantages, and these to be Communicated for engaging the benevolence of all amongit themfelves. M. You do not then make utility, but that Divine Law rooted in us from the beginning, to be the caufe (indeed the far more worthy and Divine of the two) of mens incorporating in political Societies. B. I mean not indeed that to be the Mother of Equity and Juffice, as fome would have it, but rather the Handmaid, and to be one of the guards in Cities well conftituted. M. Herein I also agree with you. B. Now as in our Bodies confifting of contrary Elements, there are Difeafes, that is, perturbations, and some intestine tumults, even so there must be of necessity in these greater Bodies, that is in Cities, which also consist of various, (yea and for the most part) contrary humours, or forts of men, and these of different ranks, conditions and natures, and which is more, of fuch as cannot remain one hour together approving the fame things: And furely fuch must needs soon diffolve and come to nought; if one be not adhibited, who as a Phylician may quiet fuch disturbances, and by a moderate and wholfom Temperament confirm the infirm parts and compefee redundant humours, and fo take care of all the Members, that the weaker may not languish for want of Nutrition, nor the stronger become luxuriant too much. M. Truly, it must needs be so. B. How then shall we call him who performeth there things in a Civil Body? B. I am not very anxious about his name, for by what name foever he be called, I think he mult be a very excellent and Divine Perfon, wherein the Wifdom of our Ancestors seemeth to have much foreseen, who have adorned the thing in it felf most illustrious with an illustrious name. I suppose you mean King, of which word there is fuch an Emphafis, that it holds forth before us clearly a function in it felf very great and excellent. B: You are very right, for we defign God by that name. For we have no other more glorious name whereby we may declare the excellency ot of his glorious Nature, nor more fuitable, whereby to fignifie his paternal care and providence towards us. What other names Ihall I collect, which we Tranflate to denote the Function of a King ? Such as Father Aneas, Agamemnen, Paftor of the People, alfo a Leader, Prince, Governour. By all which names fuch a fignification is implyed, as may flow that Kings are not ordained for themfelves, but for the People. Now as for the name we agree well enough : If you pleafe, let us confer concerning the Function, infifting in the fame Foot-fteps we began upon. M. Which, I pray? B. Do you remember what hath been lately fpoken, that an incorporation feemeth to be very like our Body, Civil Commotions like to Difeales, and a King to a Phylician ? if therefore we shall understand what the duty of a Physician is, I am of the Opinion, we shall not much mistake the duty of a King. M. It may be so, for the rest you have reckoned are very like, and seem to me very near in kin. B. Do not expect that I will here defcribe every petty thing, for the time will not permit it, neither doth the matter in hand call for it : But if briefly these agree together, you shall easily comprehend the rest. M. Go on then, as you are doing. B. The fcope feemeth to be the fame to us both. M. Which? B. The Health of the Body, for curing of which they are adhibited. M. I understand you, for the one ought to keep fafe the humane Body in its state, and the other the Civil Body in its state, as far as the nature of each can bear, and to reduce into perfect Health the Body Difeafed. B. You understand very well, for there is a twofold duty incumbent to both, the one is to preferve Health, the other is to reftore it, if it become weak by fickness. M. I affent to you. B. For the Difeases of both are alike. M. It seemeth to. B. For the redundance of things hurtful, and want or fcarfity of things neceffary are alike noxious to both, and both the one and other Body is Cured almost in the fame manner, namely either by nourifhing that which is extenuate and tenderly cherishing it, or by affwaging that which is full and redundant by cafting out superfluities, and exercising the Body with moderate labours. M. It is fo, but here feems to be the difference, that the humours in the one, and manners in the other are to be rcduced into a right temperament. B. You understand it well, for the Body politick as well as the natural hath its own proper temperament, which I think very rightly we may call Juffice. For it is that which doth regard every Member, and cureth it fo as to be kept in its Function. This fometimes is done by letting of Blood, fometimes by expelling of hurtful things, as by egeftion ; and fometimes exciting caft down and timorous minds, and comforting the weak, and fo reduceth the whole Body

Body into that temperament I spoke of : and being reduced, exerciseth it with convenient exercifes, and by a certain prefcribed temperature of Labour and reft, doth preferve the reftored Health as much as can be, M. All the reft I eafily affent too, except that you place the temperament of the Body Politick in Justice : feeing temperance even by its very name and profession doth justly seem to claim these parts. B. I think it is no great matter on which of them you confer this honour. For feeing all Vertues, whereof the strength is best perceived in Action, are placed in a certain mediocrity and equability, fo are they in fome measure Connected amongst themselves, and cohere, so as it seems to be but one office in all, that is, the moderation of Lufts. Now in whatfoever kind this moderation is, it is no great matter how it be denominate : Albeir that moderation, which is placed in publick matters, and Mens mutual commerces doth feem most fitly to be understood by the name of Justice. M. Herein I very willingly affent to you, B. In the Creation of a King, I think the Ancients have followed this way, that if any among the Citi. zens where of any fingular excellency, and feemed to exceed all others in Equity and Prudence, as is reported to be done in Bee-Hives, they willingly conferred the Government or Kingdom on him. M. It is credible to have been fo. B. But what if none fuch as we have spoken of, should be found in the City? M. By that Law of Nature, whereof we formerly made mention, equals neither can, nor ought to Ufurp Dominion : For by Nature I think it Juft, that among t thefe that are equal in all other things, their course of ruling and obeying should be alike. B. What if a People, wearied with yearly Ambition be willing to Elect fome certain Perfon not altogether endowed with all Royal Vertues, but either famous by his Noble Defcent, or Warlike Valour? will you not think that he is a lawful King ? M. Most lawful, for the People have Power to Confer the Government on whom they pleafe. B. What if we shall admit some acute Man, yet not endowed with notable skil, for Curing Difeafes? Ihall we prefently account him a Phylician, as foon as he is chofen by all? M. Not at all; for by Learning, and the Experients of many Arts, and not by fuffrages is a Man made a Phylician. B. What maketh Artifts in other Arts? M. I think there is one reason of all. B. Do you think there is any Art of Reigning or not? M. Why not. B. Can you give me a reason why you think so? M. I think I can, namely that fame which is usually given in other Arts. B. What is that ? M. Beeaufe the beginnings of all Arts proceed from experience. For whillt many did rashly and without any reason undertake to Treat of many things, and others again through, exercitation and confuetude did the fame more fagacioully, fagacioufly, noticing the events on both hands, and perpending the caufes thereof, some acute Men have digested a certain order of precepts, and called that Defcription an Art. B. Then by the like animadversion may not fome Art of Reigning be defcribed, as well as the Art of Phyfick? M. I think there may. B. OF what precepts fhall it confift? M. I du not know at prefent. B. What if we shall find it out by comparing it with other Arts? M. What way? B. This way: There be fome precepts of Grammar, of Phylick and Husbandry. M. I understand. B. Shall we not call these precepts of Grammarians and Physicians Arts and Laws allo, and fo of others? M. It feens indeed fo. B. Do not the Civil Laws feem to be certain precepts of Royal Art? M. They feem fo. B. He must therefore be acquainted therewith, who would be accounted a King. M. It feems fo. B. What if he have no skill therein? Albeit the People shall command him to Reign, think you that he should be called a King? M. You caufe me here to helitate: For if I would confent with the former difcourfe, the fuffrages of the People can no more make him a King, than any other Artift. B. What think you, shall then be done? For unless we have a King chosen by fuffrages, I am afraid we shall have no lawful King at all. M. And I fear alfo the fame. B. Will you then be content that we more acurately examine what we have last fet down in comparing Arts one with another? M. Be it fo, if it fo pleafe you. B. Have we not called the precepts of Artifts in their feveral Arts, Laws? M. We have done fo. B. But I fear we have not done it circumspectly enough. M. Why? B. Becaufe he would feem abfurd who had skill in any Art, and yet not to be an Artift. M. It were fo: B. But he that doth perform what belongs to an Art, we will account him an Artift, whether he do it naturally, or by fome perpetual and conftant Tenour and faculty. M. I think fo. B. We shall then call him an Artist, who knows well this rational and prudent way of doing any thing well, providing he hath acquired that faculty by constant' Practice. M. Much . better than him who hath the bare precept without use and exercitation. B. Shall we not then account these precepts to be Art? M. Not at all. but a certain similitude thereof, or rather a shadow of Art? B. What is then that Governing faculty of Cities, which we fhall call Civil Art or Science? M. It feems you would call it Prudence : Out of which, as from a Fountain or Spring, all Laws, providing they be uleful for the prefervation of humane Society, must proceed and be derived. B. You have hit the Nail on the Head; if this then were compleat and perfect in any perfon, we might fay he were a King by Nature, and not by fuffrages. and might relign over to him a Free Power over all things : But if we find' find not fuch a man, we fhall also call him a King, who doth come neareft to that Eminent excellency of Nature, embracing in him a certain similitude of a true King. M. Let us call him so, if you please. B. And because we fear he be not firm enough against inordinate affections. which may, and for the most part use to decline Men from Truth, we shall adjoyn to him the Law, as it were a Colleague, or rather a Bridler of his Lufts. M. You do not think that a King should have an Arbitrary Power over all things. B. Not at all: For I remember, that he is not only a King, but allo a Man, Erring in many things by Ignorance. often failing willingly, doing many things by constraint : Yea a Creature eafily changeable at the blaft of every Favour or Frown, which natural Vice a Magistrate useth also to increase; so that here I chiefly find that of the Comedy made true. All by License become worse. Wherefore the most Prudent have thought it expedient to adjoyn to him a Law, which may either flew him the way, if he be ignorant, or bring him back again into the way, if he wander out of it : By thefe, I suppose, you understand, as in a representation, what I judge to be the duty of a true King. M. Of the caufe of Creating Kings, of their name and duty you have fully fatisfied me. Yet I shall not repine, if you please to add ought thereto: Albeit my mind doth hasten to hear what yet seems to remain, yet there is one thing which in all your difcourse did not a little offend me. which I think should not be past over in filence, viz. That you feem fomewhat injurious to Kings, and this very thing I did fuspect in you frequently before, whilft I often heard you to profufely commend the Ancient Common-Wealths, and the City of Venice. B You did not rightly herein judge of me. For I do not fo much look to the different form of Civil Government (fuch as was amongst the Romans, Maffilians, Venetians and others, amongst whom the Authority of Laws were more Powerful, than that of Men) as to the equity of the form of Government; nor do I think it matters much, whether King, Duke, Emperor, or Conful be the name of him who is Chiefest in Authority. providing this be granted, that he is placed in the Magiltracy for the maintainance of Equity, for if the Government be lawful we must not contend for the name thereof. For he whom we call the Duke of Venice. is nothing elfe but a lawful King : and the first Confuls did not only retain the Honours of Kings, but also their Empire and Authority, this only was the difference, that not one, but two of them did Reign (which alfo you know was usual in all the Lacedemonian Kings,) who were Created or Chofen not conftantly to continue in the Government, but for one Year. We must therefore always stand to what we spoke at first, that that Kings at first were instituted for maintaining equity. If they could have holden that foveraignty in the cafe they had received it, they might have holden and kept it perpetually; but this is free and loofed by Laws. But(as it is with human things, the State of affairs tending to worfe, the foveraign Authority which was ordained for publick utility degenerated into a proud domination. Forwhen the luft of Kings flood inftead of Laws, and men being vested with an infinite and immoderate power, did not contain themselves within bounds, but connived at many things out of favour, hatred, or felf interest, the infolency of Kings made Laws to be defired. For this cause therefore Laws were made by the People, and Kings constrained to make use, not of their own licencious Wills in judgment, but of that right or priviledge which the People had conferred upon them. For they were taught by many experiences, that it was better, that their liberty fhould be concredited to Laws than to Kings, whereas the one might decline many ways from the Truth, but the other being deaf both to intreaties and threats, might still keep one and the fame tenor. This one way of Government is to Kings prescribed, otherwise free, that they should conform their actions and speech to the Prescripts of Laws, and by the fanctions thereof divide rewards and punifhments, the greatest Bonds of holding fast together human Society. And lastly, even as faith that famous Legislator, A King should be a speaking Law, and the Law a dumb King. M. At first you so highly praifed Kings, that you made their Majesty almost glorious and facred, but now, as if you had repented in fo doing, I do not know within what strait Bonds you shut them up, and being thrust into the Prison (I may fay) of Laws, you do scarce give them leave to speak. And as for my part, you have disappointed me of my expectation very far. For I expected, that (according to the most famous Hiftorians) you fhould have reftored the thing which is the most glorious both with God and Man, into its own fplendor, either of your own aecord, or at my defire in the feries in your difcourfe, which being spoiled of all Ornaments, you have brought it into fubjection, and that Authority, which through all the World is the chiefest, you having hedged in round about and niade it almost so contemptible, as not to be defired by any Man in his right wits. For what Man in his right wits would not rather live as a private Man with a mean fortune, than being still in action about other Mens Affairs, to be in perpetual trouble, and neglecting his own Affairs, to order the whole Courfe of his Life according to other Mens Rules? But if that be the Terms of Government every where propoled, I fear there will be a greater fcarcity of Kings found, than was of Bishops in the first Infancy of our Religion. Nor do I much wonder, if Kings gr. f

Kings be regarded according to this plate form, being but Men taken from Feeding Cattle, and from the Plough, who took upon them that glorious Dignity. B. Confider I pray you, in how great an Error you are, who does think that Kings were Created by People and Nations not for Justice, but for pleasure, and does think there can be no Honour, where Wealth and Pleafures abound not; wherein confider how much you diminish their Grandeur. Now that you may the more easily understand it; compare any one King of those you have feen apparrelled like a Childs puppet brought forth with a great deal of Pride and a great many attendants, meetly for vain oftentation, the reprefentation whereof you mifs in that King whom we defcribe. Compare, I fay, fome one of those, who were famous of old, whose memory doth even yet live, flourisheth and is renowned to all Posterity. Indeed they were fuch as I have now been defcribing. Have you never heard what an old woman petitioning Philip King of Macedon to hear her Caufe, anfivered him, he having faid to her, he had no leafure, to which the replied, then ceafe, (faid fhe) to be King ? have you never heard, (I fay) that a King victorious in fo many Battles, and Conqueror of fo many Nations, admonished to do his duty by a Poor old wife, obeyed, and acknowledged that it was the duty of Kings fo to do? Compare then this Philip not only with the greatest Kings that are now in Europe, but alfo with all that can be remembred of old, you shall furely find none of them comparable to those either for Prudence, Fortitude, or activity; few equal to them for largeness of Dominions. If I should enumerate Agefilaus, Leonidas, and the reft of the Lacedemonian Kings (O how great Men were they) I shall feem to utter but obsolete Examples. Yet one faying of a Lacedemonian Maid I cannot pass over with filence, her Name was Gorgo the Daughter of Cleomedes, fhe feeing a Servant pulling off the Stockings of an Afian Ghuest, and running to her Father cry'd out, Father, the Ghuest hath no Hands; from which Speech of that Maid you may eafily judge of the Lacedemonian discipline and domestick Custom of their Kings. Now those who proceeded out of this ruffick, but couragious way of life, did very great things: but those who were bred in the Asiatick way, loft by their luxury and floth the great dominions given their Ancestors. And, that I may lay aside the Ancients. Such a one was Pelagius not long ago among the People of Galicia, who was the first that weakned the Saracen forces in Spain, yet him and all his the Grave did inclose, yet of him the Spanish Kings are not ashamed, accounting it their greatest glory to be descended of him. But seing this place doth call for a more large discourse, let us return from whence we have digreffed greffed. For I defire to fhew you with the first that I promised, namely that this form of Government hath not been contrived by me, but feems to have been the fame to the most famous men in all Ages, and Ishall shew briefly you the fpring from whence I have drawn thefe things. The Books of M. Tullius Cicero which are intitled of Offices are by common confent of all accounted most praise worthy, in the second Book thereof these words are set down verbatim, it fecms as Herodotus faith that of old, well bred Kings were created, not amongft the Medes only, but also amongft our Ancestors for executing of Juffice, for whilft at first the People were oppressed by those that had greatest wealth, they betook themselves to some one who was eminent for vertue, who whillt he kept off the weakeft from injuries, establishing equity, he hemmed in the highest with the lowest by equal Laws to both. And the reason of making Laws was the same as of the Creation of Kings, for it is requilite that justice be always equal, for otherwise it were not justice. If this they did obtain from one good and just Man, they were therewith well pleafed, when they did not occur, Laws were made, which by one and the fame voice might fpeak to all alike. This then indeed is evident, that those were usually chosen to govern, of whose justice the People had a great opinion. Now this was added, that these Rulers or Kings might be accounted prudent, there was nothing that Men thought they could not obtain from fuch Rulers. I think, you fee from thefe words, what Cicero judgeth to be the reason of requiring both Kings and Laws. I might here commend Zenophon a witness requiring the fame, no lefs famous in War-like affairs, than in the fludy of Phylofopy, but that I know you are fo well acquainted with his Writings, as that you have all his fentences marked. I pass at prefent Plato and Arifetle, albeit I am not ignorant how much you have them in estimation. For I had rather adduce for confirmation Men famous in a middle degree of affairs, than out of Schools. Far lefs do I think fit to produce a Stoick King, fuch as by Seneca in Thyestes is described : Not so much because that Idea of a King is not perfect, as because that Examples of a good Prince may be rather impreffed in the Mind, than at any time hoped for. But left in those I have produced there might be any ground of calumny, I have not set before you Kings out of the Scythian folitude, who did either ungird their own Horfes, or did other fervile work, which might be very far from our manner of living: but even out of Greeze, and fuch, who in these very times, wherein the Grecians did most flourish in all liberal Sciences, did rule the greatest Nations, or well governed Cities; and did so rule, that whilst they were alive were in very great efteem amongst their People, and being dead left to Posterity a famous memory memory of themfelves. M. If now you ask me what my judgment is, I scarce dare confess to you either mine inconstancy or timidity, or by what other name it shall please you to call that vice. For as often as I read these things you have now recited in the most famous Historians, or hear the fame commended by very wife Men, whofe Authority I dare not decline: and that they are approved by all good and honeft Men to be not only true, equitable and fincere, but also feem strong and fplendid. Again as oft as I caft mine Eyes on the neatnefs and elegancy of our times, that antiquity feemeth to have been venerable and sober, but yet rude, and not sufficiently polished, but of these things we may perhaps speak of hereafter at more leafure. Now if it please you, go on to profecute what you have begun. B. May it please you then that we recollect briefly what hath been faid? Is shall we understand best what is past, and if ought be rashly granted, we shall very foon retract it. M. Yes indeed. B. First of all then we agree, that Men by nature are made to live in fociety together, and for a communion of life. M. That is agreed upon. B. That a King also chosen to maintain that fociety is a Man eminent in Vertue. M. It is fo. B. And as the difcords of Men amongst themselves brought in the necessity of creating a King, fo the Injuries of Kings done against their Subjects were the caufe of defiring Laws. M. I acknowledg that. B. We held Laws to be a Proof of the Art of Government, even as the Precepts of Phylitians are of the Medicinal Art. M.It is fo. B.But it feems to be more fafe (because in neither of the two have we fet down any fingular and exact Skill of their feveral Arts) that both do, as speedily as may be, heal by these Prescripts of Art. M. It is indeed fafelt. B. Now the Precepts of the Medicinal Art are not of one kind. M. How ? B. For fome of them are for prefervation of health, others for reftoration thereof. M. Very right. B. What fay you of the governing Art? M. I think there be as many kinds. B. Next then it feems, that we confider it. Do you think, that Phylitians can fo exactly have Skill of all difeafes and of their remedies, as nothing more can be required for their cure? M. Not at all for many new kinds of Difeases arife almost in every Age, and new remedies for each of them, almost every year are by Men's Industry found out, or brought from far Countries. B. What think you of the Laws of Commonwealths. M. Surely their cafe feems to be the fame. B. Therefore neither Phylitians, nor Kings can evite or cure all Difeafes of Common-wealths, by the Precepts of their Arts, which are delivered to them in Writ. M. I think indeed they cannot. B. What if we shall farther try of what things Laws may be established in Commonwealths, and what cannot be comprehended within Laws. M. That will be worth worth our pains. B. There feems to be very many and weighty things, which cannot be contained within Laws. First, all fuch things, as fall into the deliberation of the time to come. M. All indeed. B. next, many things already paft, fuch are these wherein truth is fought by conjectures, confirmed by Witneffes, or extorted by Torments. M. Yes indeed. B. In unfolding then these Questions, what shall the King do ? M. I fee here there is no need of a long difcourfe, feeing Kings do not fo arrogate the Supream Power in those things which are instituted with respect to the time to come, that of their own accord they call to Council fome of the most prudent. B. What fay you of those things which by conjectures are found out, and made out by Wirneffes, fuch as are the Crimes of Murther, Adultery and Witchcraft? M. These are examined by the skill of Lawyers, difcovered by diligence, and thefe I find to be for the most part left to the judgment of Judges. B. And perhaps very right; for if a King would needs be at the private caufes of each Subject. when shall he have time to think upon Peace and War, and those affairs which maintain and preferve the fafety of the Common-wealth? And laftly when shall he get leave to reft? M. neither would I have the cognition of every thing to be brought unto a King, neither can one man be fufficient for all the caufes of all men, if they be brought unto him : that Council no lefs wife than neceffary doth pleafe me exceeding well, which the Father in Law of Mefes gave him in dividing amongst many the Burden of hearing Caufes, whereof I fhall not fpeak much, feeing the Hiftory is known to all. B. But I think, thefe Judges must Judg according to Law. M. They must indeed do fo. But as I conceive, there be but tew things, which by Laws may be provided against, in respect of those which cannot be provided against.

B. There is another thing of no lefs difficulty, because all these things which call for Laws, cannot be comprehended by certain prefcriptions. M. How fo: B. Lawyers, who attribute very much to their own Art, and who would be accounted the Priefts of Juffice, do confess that there is fo great a multitude of affairs, that it may feem almost infinite, and fay that daily arife new crimes in Cities, as it were feveral kinds of Ulcers, what shall a Law-giver do herein, who doth accommodate Laws both to things prefent and preterite ? M. Not much, unlefs he be fome Divine-like Perfon. B. Another difficulty doth alfo Occur, and that not a finall one, that in fo great an Inconftancy of humane Frailty, no Art can almost prefcribe any thing altogether stable and firm. M. There is nothing more true than that. B. It feemeth then most fafe to trust a skilful Phylician in the Health of the Patient, and also the King in the State of the Com-D 2 mon-17

mon-wealth. For a Phyfitian without the rule of Art will oftentimes Cure a weak Patient, either by confenting thereto, or against his will : And a King doth either perfwade a new Law useful to his Subjects. or else may impose it against their will. M. I do not see what may hinder him therein. B. Now feeing both the one and the other do these things, do you think that befides the Law, either of them makes his own Law? M. It feems that both doth it by Art. For we have before concluded not that to be Art which confifts of precepts, but Vertue contained in the mind, which the Artift ufually makes use of in handling the matter which is fubject to Arts. Now I am glad (feeing you fpeak ingenuoufly) that you being conftrained, as it were, by an interdiction of the very truth, do so far restore the King from whence he was by force dejected. B. Stay, you have not yet heard all. There is another inconvenience in the Authority of Laws. For the Law being as it were a pertinacious. and a certain rude Exactor of duty, thinks nothing right, but what it felf doth command. But with a King, there is an excuse of Infirmity and Temerity, and place of Pardon left for one found in an Error. The Law is Deaf, Cruel and Inexorable. A Young man Pleads the frailty of his Years, a Woman the infirmity of Her Sex, another his Poverty. Drunkenneß, Affection. What faith the Law to these excuses? Go Officer or Serjeant, convene a Band of Men, Hoodwink him, Scourge him, Hang him on a Tree. Now you know how dangerous a thing it is, in fo great a Humane frailty, to have the hope of Safety placed in Innocency alone. M. In very Truth you tell me a thing full of Hazard. B. Surely as oft as these things come into mind, I perceive some not a little troubled. M. You speak true. B. When therefore I ponder with my felf what is before past as granted, I am afraid left the comparison of a Phyfitian and of a King in this cafe feem not pertinently enough introduced. M. In what cafe? B. When we have liberated both of the fervitude of precepts, and given them almost a free liberty of Curing. M. What doth herein especially offend you? B. When you hear it, you will then judge. Two caufes are by us fet down, why it is not expedient for a People that Kings be loofed from the bonds of Laws, namely, love and hatred, which drive the minds of Men to and fro in judging. But in a Phyfitian it is not to be feared, left he fail through love, feeing he expecteth a reward from his Patient being reftored to Health. But if a Patient understand that his Physitian is folicited by Intreaties, Promiles and Mony against his Life, he may call another Phylitian, or if he can find none other, I think it is more fafe to feek fome remedy from Books how Deaf foever, than from a corrupt Phylitian. Now becaufe we

we have complained of the Cruelty of Laws, look if we understand one another fufficiently. M. How fo? B. We judged an excellent King, fuch as we may more fee in mind, than with Bodily Eyes, not to be bound by any Laws. M. By none. B. Wherefore? M. I think, becaufe, according to Paul, he fhould be a Law to himfelf and to others, that he may express in life what is by Law enjoyned. B. You judge rightly; and that you may perhaps the more admire, feveral Ages before Paul, Aristotle did see the same, following Nature as a Leader, which therefore I fay, that you may fee the more clearly what hath been proved before, to wit, that the Voice of God and Nature is the fame. But that we may profecute our purpole. What shall we fay they had a respect unto, who first made Laws? M. Equity I think, as hath been faid before. B. I do not now demand that, what end they had before them, but rather what pattern they proposed to themselves? M. Albeit perhaps I understand that, yet I would have you to explain it, that you may confirm my judgment, if I rightly take it up, if not, you may amend my Error. B. You know, I think, what the dominion is of the mind over the Body. M. I feem to know it. B. You know this alfo, what ever we do not rashly, that there is a certain Idea thereof first in our minds, and that it is a great deal more perfect than the works to be done, which according to that Pattern the chiefest Artists, do frame, and as it were express. M. That indeed I find by experience both in speaking and writing, and perceive no lefs words in my mind, than my mind in things wanting. For neither can our mind, fhut up in this dark and troubled Prifon of the Body, perceive the fubtility of all things; nor can we fo endure in our mind the representation of things however foreseen in discourse with others, fo as they are not much inferiour to these which our intellect hath formed to it felf. B. What shall we say then which they set before them, who made Laws ? M. I feem almost to understand what you. would be at. Namely, that they in Council had an Idea of that perfect King, and that they did express a certain Image, not of the Body but of the mind, according to that forefaid Idea, as near as they could. And would have that to be inflead of Laws which he is to think might be good and equitable. M. You rightly understand it. For that is the very thing I would fay. But now I would have you to confider what manner of King that is which we have conftitute at first, was he not one firm and stedfast against Hatred, Love, Wrath, Envy, and other perturbations of the mind ? M. We did indeed imagine him to be fuch a one: Or believed him to have been fuch to those Ancients. B. But do Laws feem to have been made according to the Idea of him? M. Nothing thing more likely. B. A good King then is no lefs fevere and inexorable, than a good Law. M. He is even as fevere : But fince I can change neither, or ought to defire it, yet I would flacken both fomewhat, if I can. B. But God defires not that mercy be shewed even to the Poor in judgment, but commandeth us to refpect that one thing which is Just and Equal, and to pronounce Sentence accordingly. M. I do acknowledge that, and by truth am overcome. Seeing therefore it is not lawful to loofe Kings from the Bonds of Laws, who shall then be the Law-giver ? Whom shall we give him as a Pedagogue ? B. whom do you think fitteft to perform this duty ? M. If you ask at me. I think the King himfelf. For in all other Arts almost we fee their precepts are given by the Artifts; whercof they make use, as it were of comments, for confirming their Memory, and putting others in mind of their duty. B. On the contrary I fee no difference : Let us grant that a King is at liberty and folved from the Laws, shall we grant him the Power to command Laws? For no Man will willingly lay Bonds and Fetters upon himfelf. And I know not whether it be better to leave a Man without Bonds, or to Fetter him with flight Bonds, because he may rid himself thereof when he pleafes. M. But when you concredit the Helm of Government rather to Laws than to Kings, beware I pray you, left you make him a Tyrant, whom by name you make a King, who with Authority doth oppress and with Fetters and Imprisonment doth bind, and fo let him be fent back to the Plough again, or to his former condition, yet free of Fetters. B. Brave words : I impose no Lord over him, but I would have it in the Peoples Power, who gave him the Authority over themfelves, to prefcribe to him a Mcdel of his Government, and that the King may make use of that Justice, which the People gave him over themfelves. This I crave. I would not have thefe Laws to be by force imposed, as you interpret it, but I think that by a Common Council' with the King, that fhould be generally established, which may generally tend to the good of all. M. You will then grant this Liberty to the People? B. Even to the People indeed, unless perhaps you be of another mind. M. Nothing feems lefs equitable. B. Why fo? M. You know that faying, a Bealt with many Heads. You know, I suppose, how great the temerity and inconftancy of a People is. B. I did never imagine' that that matter eight to be granted to the judgment of the whole People in general, but that near to our Cuftom, a felect number out of all Effates may convene with the King in Council. And then how forn an overture by them is made, that it be deferred to the Peoples judgment. M. I understand well enough your advice. But by this to careful a Caution tion you feem to help your felf nothing. You will not have a King loofed from Laws, why? Becaufe, I think, within Man two must Cruel Monsters lust and wrath are in a continual conflict with reason." Laws have been greatly defired, which might reprefs their boldnefs, and reduce them too much infulting, to regard a just Government. What will these Courfellors given by the People do? Are they not troubled by that fame inteffine conflict? Do they not conflict with the fame evils as well as the King? The more then you adjoyn to the King as Affeffors, there will be the greater number of Fools, from which you fee what is to be expe-Eted, B. But I expect a far other thing than you suppose. Now I shall tell you why I do expect it. First, it is not altogether true what you suppose, viz. That the Assembling together of a multitude is of no purpole, of which number there will perhaps be none of a profound wit : for not only do many see more and understand more than one of them apart, but also more than one, albeit he exceed their wit and prudence. For a multitude for the most part doth better judge of all things, than fingle perfons apart. For every one apart have fome particular Vertues, which being United together make up one excellent Vertue, which may be evidently feen in Phylicians Pharmacies, and effectially in that Antidote, which they call Mithredate. For therein are many things of themselves hurtful apart, which being compounded and mingled together make a wholefom Remedy against Poyfon. In like manner in fome Men flowness and lingring doth hurt, in others a Pricipitant Temerity, both which being mingled together in a multitude make a certain Temperament and Mediocrity, which we require to be in every kind of Vertue. M Be it fo, feeing you will have it fo, let the People make Laws and Execute them ; and let Kings be as it were Keepers of Registers. But when Laws feem to Clash, or are not exact and perfpicuous enough in Sanctions, will you allow the King no interest or medling here, especially fince you will have him to judge all things by written Laws, there must needs enfue many absurdities. And, that I may make use of a very common example of that Law commended in the Schools. If a Stranger scale a Wall, let him die. What can be more absurd than this, that the Author of a publick fafety (who have thrust down the enemies preffing hard to be up) should be drawn to punishment, as if he had in Hostility attempted to scall the walls. B. That is nothing. M. You approve then that old faying, the highest justice is the highest injury. B. I do indeed. If any thing of this kind come into debate, there is need of a meek interpreter, who may not fuffer the Laws which are made for the good of all to be calamitous to good Men, and deprehend in no Crime. B. You are

are very right, neither is there any thing elfe by me fought in all this dispute, (if you have fufficiently noticed it) than that Ciceronian Law might be venerable and inviolable. Salus Populi suprema Lex esto. If then any fuch thing shall come into debate, so that it be clear what is good and juft, the Kings duty will be to advert that the Law may reach that Rule I spoke of, but you in behalf of Kings seem to require more, than the most imperious of them affume. For you know that these kind of Queftions is ufually referred to Judges, when Law feemeth to require one thing, and the Law-giver another; even as these Laws which arise from an ambiguous right, or from the Difcord of Laws amongst themfelves. Therefore in fuch cafes molt grievous contentions of Advocates arife in Judicatories, and Orators precepts are diligently produced. M. I know that to be done which you fay. But in this Cafe no lefs Wrong feems to be done to Laws than to Kings. For I think it better to end that Debate prefently, from the Saying of one good Man, than to grant the Power of darkning, rather than interpreting Laws to fubtle Men. and fometimes to crafty Knaves; for whilft not only Contention arifeth betwixt Advocate for the Caufes of Parties contending, but alfo for Glory, Conteffs are nourifhed in the mean time, Right or Wrong, Equity or Inequity is called in queftion; and what we deny to a King, we grant to Men of inferior Rank, who fludy more to debate, than to find out the Truth. B. You feem to me forgetful of what we lately agreed upon. M. What is that? B. That all things are to be fo freely granted to an excellent King, as we have defcribed him, that there might be no need of any Laws. But whilst this honour is conferred to one of the People, who is not much more excellent than others, or even inferior to fome, that free and loofe Lifence from Laws is dangerous. M. But what ill doth that to the interpretation of Law. B. Very much. Perhaps you do not confider, that in other words we reftore to him that infinite and immoderate Power, which formerly we denied to a King, namely, that according to his own Hearts luft he may turn all things upfide-down. M. If I do that, then certainly I do it imprudently. B. I shall tell you more plainly, that you may understand it. When you grant the interpretation of Laws to a King, you grant him fuch a Licence, as the Law doth not tell what the Law giver meaneth, or what is good and equal for all in general, but what may make for the Interpreters benefit, fo that he may bend it to all a fions for his own benefit or advantage, as the Lesbian Rule. Ap. Claudius in his Decemviratus, made a very just Law, that in a liberal Caufe or Plea, fureties fhould be granted for liberty. What more clearly could have been spoken. But by interpreting the same Author

Author made his own Law useles. You see; I suppose how much liberty you give a Prince by one cast, namely, that what he pleaseth the Law doth fay, what pleaseth him not, it doth not fay. If we shall once admit this, it will be to no purpose to make good Laws for teaching a good Prince his duty; and hemm in an ill King. Yea let me tell you more plainly, it would be better to have no Laws at all, than that freedom to fleal fhould be tolerate, and also honoured under pretext of Law. M. Do you think that any King will be fo impudent, that he will not at all have any regard of the fame and opinion that all Men have of him? Or that he will be fo forgetful of his Subjects, that he will degenerate into their Pravity, whom he hath reftrained by ignominy, imprisonment, confiscation of Goods, and in a word with very grievous punishments? B. Let us not believe that these things will be, if they had not been done long ago, and that to the exceeding great hurt of the whole World. M. Where do you tell these things were done? B.Do you ask, where? As if all the Nations in Europe did not only fee, but feel also how much mischief hath the immoderate Power, and unbridled Tyranny of the Pope of Rome brought upon human Affairs. Even that Power which from fmall beginning and feemingly honeft he had got, every Man doth know that no less can be feared by unwary Perfons. At first, Laws were proposed to us, not only drawn out of the innermost fecrets of Nature, but given by God himfelf, explained by the Prophets from the holy Spirit, at last by the Son of God, and by the fame God confirmed, committed to the writings of those praise worthy men, expressed in their Life, and fealed with their Blood. Neither is there in the whole Law any other place more carefully, commendably, or more clearly delivered, than that of the Office of Bishops. Now seeing it is lawful to no man to add any thing to thefe Laws, to abrogate or derogate ought therefrom, or to change any thing therein, there did remain but one interpretation, and whilst the Pope did arrogate it, he not only did oppress the rest of the Churches, but claimed a Tyranny the most cruel of all that ever were, daring to command not only Men but Angels alfo, plainly reducing Chrift into order, if this be not to reduce him into order, that what thou wilt have done in Heaven, in Earth and amongft the damned in Hell, be ratified : what Chrift hath commanded, let it be ratified, if thou wilt ; for if the Law feem to make but little for your behoof, interpreting it thus you may back bend it, fo that not only by your Mouth, but alfo according to the judgment of your Mind Chrift is conftrained to speak. Christ therefore speaking by the Mouth of the Pope, Pipin is fet in Childericks place of Government, Ferdinandus of Arra-Ε

gon substitute to John King of Navare: the Son arose in Arms against his Father, and Subjects against their King. (hrist is full of Poylon, then he is forced by Witches, Witch M I have heard these things often before, but I defire to hear more plainly fomewhat of that interpretation of Laws. B. I shall offer you one Example, from which you may eafily understand, how much this whole kind is able to do. The Law is, a Bishop must be the Husband of one Wife, than which Law what is more clear, and what may be faid more plain? One Wife, (faith the Law) one Church, (faith the Pope) fuch is his interpretation. As if that Law were made not to repress the Lusts of Bilhops but their Avarice. Now this Explanation, albeit it faith nothing to the purpole, yet doth contain a judgment hone? and pious, if he had not vitiated that Law again by another interpretation. What doth therefore the Pope devise for excuse? It varieth (faith he) in regard of perfons, cafes, places and times. Some are of that eminent disposition, that no number of Churches can fatisfie their Pride. Some Churches again are fo poor, that they cannot maintain him who was lately a begging Monk, if he have now a Mitre, if he would maintain the name of a Bifhop. There is a reason invented from that crafty interpretation of the Law, that they may be called Bifhops of one Church, or other Churches given them in Commendam, and all may be robbed. Time would fail me, if I should reckon up the cheats, which are dayly excogitate against one Law. But albeit these things be most unbeseeming as well the name of a Pope, as of a Christian, yet their Tyranny refts not here. For fuch is the nature of all things, that when they once begin to fall they never ftay until they fall headlong into destruction. Will you have me to fhew you this by a famous Example? Do you not remember upon any of the Roman Emperors blood who was more cruel and wicked than C. Caligula ? M. There was none that I know of. B. Now what was his most nefarious villany think you? I do not speak of those deeds which Popes do reckon up in some referved cases, but in the rest of his life. M. I do not at prefent remember. B. What do you think of that, that having called upon his Horfe, he invited him to fup with him? Set a golden grain of Barley before him, and made him Conful? M. Indeed it was most impioully done. B. What think you of that, how he made the fame Horfe his Colleague in the Priesthood? M. Do you tell me that in good earnest? B. Indeed in good earnest, nor do I admire that these things feem to you feigned. But that Roman Jupiter of ours hath done fuch things, that those things done by Caligula may feem true to Posterity. I fay Pope Julius the third, who feems contending with C. Calizula light a most wicked wretch for prehemincy of impiety. M. What did he of that Kind? B. He made his Ape-keeper, a Man almost more vile than the vileft Beaft, his Colleague in the Papary. M. Perhaps there was another caufe of chooling him. B. Some are reported indeed, but I have picked out the most honest. Seeing then to great a contempt not only of the Priesthood, but also a forgetfulness of humanity arise from this freedom of interpreting Laws, beware you think that to be a small Power. M. But the Antients feern not to have thought it fo great .2 bufinefs of interpreting, as you would have it feem to be: Which by by this one argument may be understood, because the Roman Emperours granted it to Lawyers: which one reason doth overturn your whole tedious dilpute, nor doth it only refute what you fooke of the greatness of that Power, but also that which you most fhun, it perspicuously declareth, what Power they granted to others of answering rightly, was not denied to themfelves, if they had been pleafed to exerce that office, or could have done it by reason of greater affairs. B. As for those -Roman Emperours, whom the Soldiers did choose indeliberately, and without any regard to the common good of all. These fall not under this notion of Kings which we have defcribed, fo that by those that were most wieked were they choosen who for the most part were most wicked, or elfe laid hold upon the Government by violence. Now I do not reprehend) them, for granting Power to Lawyers to interpret the Law, And albeit that Power be very great, as I have faid before, it is not with flanding more fafely concredited to them to whom it cannot be an inftrument of Tyranny. Moreover it was concredited to many whom mutual reverence did hold within the bounds of duty, that if, one decline from equity, he might be refuted by another. And if they flould have all agreed together into fraud, the help of the Judge was above them, who was not obliged to hold for Liaw what ever was given by Lawyers for an Answer. And over all was the Emperour, who might punish the breach of Laws. They being aftricted by fo many Bonds were hemmed in, and did fear a more grievous punifhment, than any reward of fraud they could expect :- you fee, I suppose then that the danger to be feared from fuch kind of Men was not to great. M. Have you no more to fay of a King ? B. Firft, if you pleafe, let us collect together, what is already Ipoken, to that the more eafily we may understand, if any thing be omitted. M. I think we should do fo. B. We feemed to be at accord fufficiently concerning the origine and caufe of creating Kings, and making Laws, but of the Lawgiver not fo: but at last, though fomewhat unwillingly. I feem'd to have confented, being enforced by the ftrength of in E 2 truth

Truth. M. Certainly you have not only taken from a King the Power of commanding Laws, but also of interpreting them, even whilst I'as an Advocate strongly protested against it. Wherein I am afraid, if the Matter come to publick hearing, left I be accused of Prevarication, for having to eatily fuffered a good Caufe, as it feemed at first, to be wrung out of my Hands. B. Be of good Courage, for if any accule you of Prevarication in this Cafe, I promise to be your Defence. M. Perhaps we will find that shortly. B. There seems to be many kinds of Affairs which can be comprehended within no Laws, whereof we laid over a part on ordinary Judges, and a part on the Kings Council by the Kings Confent. M. I do remember we did fo indeed. And when you was doing that, wot you what came into my Mind? B. How can I, unlefs you tell me? M. Methought you made Kings in a manner like Stone Seals, which for the most part fo feem to lean on the Tops of Pillars. as if they did fultain the whole Fabrick : whereas in effect they bear no more Burthen than any other Stone. B. What ! good Advocate of Kings, do you complain that I lay on them a little Burthen, feeing both Day and Night they do nothing elfe than feek out others to bear Burthen with them, or upon whom they may altogether lay the Burthen, and so disburden themselves. And in the mean time you feem to take it in ill part, that I afford them Help, labouring under their Burthen. M. I alfo very willingly admit thefe Auxiliaries, but fuch would I have as may ferve, but not command, fuch as may flew the way, but not lead in the way, or more truly draw or rush them forward as some warlike Engine, and leave a King no other Power but to affent to them. Therefore I prefently expect, that having ended our Discourse concerning a King, you would step aside to speak of Tyrants, or some whereelfe. For you have inclosed a King within to narrow Bounds. that I am afraid, left, if we tarry longer therein, you drive him out of his greatest Wealth and highest Dignity, and banish him as it were into fome defert Island, where being spoiled of all his Honours, he wax old in Poverty and Mifery. B. You feared, as you pretend, the Crime of Prevarication; but I am afraid, lest in calumniating you wrong the King, whom you endeavour to defend. First, I would not have him to be idle, unless you would appoint idle Master-builders: Secondly, you deprive him of good Ministers and Friends, whom I have adjoyned unto him, not as Keepers, but would have them called by him to bear a part of his Labour, and thefe being driven away, you furround him with a Band of Knaves, who make him to be feared by his Subjects, neither do you think he will

will be formidable, unless we allow him a great Power of doing Wrong. I would have him to be by his Subjects beloved, not to be guarded by the Terror, but good Will of his Subjects, which Arms alone do make Kings Invincible, unlefs you gainfay this, I truft I shall shortly prove it. For I shall lead him out of these you call Straits into Light; and by one Law shall give him fo much Authority and Enlargement, that if he defires more, he may feem impudent. M. Indeed I long to hear that. B. I shall then fall upon that Matter, that I may fatifie your Defire as foon as I can. A little before we have confelled, that no Law can be fo accurately cautioned concerning any Affair, but that malicious Subtlety may invent fome Fraud. This perhaps will be the better underftood by the Example already proposed. By the Law, it is ordained, that no Parents transmit their Benefices to their Bastards. Here in effect the Law feems clear, yet a Cheat is found out; that the Father fublitutes fome other Man, and that he may deliver that fame Benefice to the Bastard of the former Possesfor. Thereafter, when as it was carefully ordained by Law, that the Son fhould by no means enjoy that Benefice which his Father had possefield before : yet by this Caution it was never a whit the better. For against that Law a Paction was found out among Priefts, that each of them should substitute the Son of the other in his Office. And when that was also forbidden, the Law was also eluded by another kind of Cheat: a pretender was fet up against the Father, who might pretend he had a Right to that Benefice. Whilst the Father feemingly is a contending with this fuppoled Sycophant, the Son doth petition the Pope for the Benefice, if fo be that the Right unto that Benefice belong not to either of the Parties contending for it, and fo the Son, by his Fathers Prevarication, dorh enjoy his Fathers Benefice, and overcometh both the Parties, who willingly and freely yield up their Plea. Thus you fee how many kinds of Cheats are invented against one Law. M. I fee it. B. Do not Lawgivers feem to do altogether the fame herein which Phyficians do, who whilft they endeavour, by applying a Plaifter to compefee the Eruptions. of Flegm, or of fome other hurtful Humor, the Humor reftrained in one place, feeks Iffue in many places at once; and as a certain Hydra having one Head cut off, many Heads start up in place of one. M. Nothing more like. B. What was incumbent for a Phyfitian to do at first, for freeing the whole Body at once of peccant Humors, ought not the Politick Phylitian do the fame in this Cafe, for freeing the whole Common-wealth of evil Manners? M. I think that to be the right way of Cure, albeit it be difficult. B. And if this can be obtained.

ed, I think there would be need of few Laws. M. It is indeed fo. B. Doth not he alone' feem to confer more for the Publick Good, who can apply this Remedy, than all the Conventions of all Eftates met for making of Laws? M. Doubtlefs far more. But that I may make use of the Comick Poets Words, Who is able to undertake fo weighty a Charge? B. What if we shall lay it over on the King? M. Merrily spoken indeed. What was soon done and easie, you have committed to the whole People; but if any thing be difficult and intricate, you will lay it over upon the King alone, as if you thought him not fufficiently bound, tying him round about with fo many Fetters, unlefs you lay upon him a most grievous Burthen, under which he may also fuccumb. B. It is not fo, but we contend for a Business easie for him to be done; we befeech, he would fuffer himfelf to be exorable. M. What is that, 1 pray ? B. That as Fathers ought to carry towards their Children, fo in all his Life he would behave himfelf towards his Subjects, whom he ought to account as Children. M. What is that to the purpofe in hand? B. Surcly this one is certainly the chiefest Remedy against corrupt Manners, and left you suppose that it is an Invention of mine, here what Claudianus faith. Thou King, must as a Father Rule thy Subjects, and no lefs have a care of all than of thy felf ; let not thy own Defire only move thee, but also the Publick Defires of thy People. If thou commandeft, ought to be done by all, and to be obeyed, obey the fame first thy felf. Then will the People become the more observant of Equity; nor will refuse to bear any Burthen, when they fee their King himfelf obedient to what he commands. The whole World doth act conform to the Example of a King. The Laws of Kings prevail not fo much to incline Mens Minds unto Obedience, as the Converfation of the Rulers. For the fluctuating Multitude doth always change as their Prince doth. Do not Imagine that the Poet pregnant for understanding and learning did in vain believe fo great force to be herein, for People are to addicted to the initation of Kings, in whom any Image of Honefty doth fhine or appear, and fo endeavour to express their manners, that whofe Vertue they admire, they endeavour also to imitate fome of their Vices in Speech, Apparel in deport. But in conforming themfelves to the King in gefture, manners of Speech they not only delire to imitate him. but also by flattery they infinuate themselves into the minds of great ones, and by these Arts they hunt after Riches, Honour and Preferment, because they know we have it by Nature, that we Love not only our felves, and our own concerns, but embrace our own likeness though vicious in others. Now that which we demand not Wickedly and Arrogantly, gantly, but by Entreaty endeavour to obtain, hath a far greater force than the Threatnings of Laws, the Oftentation of Punishments, or Armies of Souldiers. This reduceth a People without force into Modefty, conciliateth to a King his Subjects good Liking, increaseth and maintaineth the publick Tranquility, and the Wealth of every one feverally. Let therefore a King carefully confider, that he is fet on the Theatre of the World, and for a Spectacle proposed to all, fo as no Word or Deed of his can be concealed. The Vices of Kings can never be kept fecret. For the Supream Light of Fate fuffers nothing to lye hid in Obscurity, and Fame enters into all fecret Places, and finds out obfcure Corners. O how much doth it concern Kings to be circumfpect on all hands, feeing neither their Vices nor their Vertues can be concealed, nor yet without a great univerfal Change of Affairs. But if any do yet doubt, what great Importance there is in the Conversation of a Prince, for the Emendation of the publick Difcipline, let him take but a View of the finall beginning of the State of Rome. That rude People confifting of Shepherds and Country Inhabitants, I shall not fay worfe, naturally fierce, having got a very couragious King, and having pitched once their Tents, for foliciting the Peace of the Neighbouring Nations, and provoking them to fight, how much do you think of Hatred and Fear was bred in their Neighbours? When again that very fame People had fet over them a pious and just King, they were fo fuddenly changed, that being wholly devoted to the Worfhip of their Gods, and to Acts of Justice, that to wrong them their Neighbours judged it a Crime, even those very Neighbours, I fay, whofe Lands before they had laid walte, whofe Cities they had burnt, and their Children and Kinfmen they had carried away into Bondage. Now if in that Barbarity of Manners, and Rudenefs of Times, Numa Pompilius (who a little before was brought out of another Nation at Enmity with them, and made King) could do fo much : what fhall we expect, or rather, what fhall we not expect of those Princes, who being supported by Affinity, Vassals, and much Wealth left them by their Anceltors, obtain the Government? And are born . and brought up in expectation thereof. Now how much fhould it ftir up their Minds unto Vertue, that they hope to have the Praife not of one Day, as Stage-players do, the Scene being once paft, but the good Will, Admiration, and perpetual Remembrance of their Life to all Pofterity, and know that Honours in Heaven are prepared for them ? I wifh I could express in Words the Representation of that Honour, which in mind I have conceived. Now that I may fomewhat propole unto your View the fame by fome of the first Draughts and

and Lineaments thereof, confider with your felf, how the brafen Serpent erected by Mofes in the Defert of Arabia, did heal the Wounds made by other Serpents, by a very Look of the People thereon. Imagine that out of the whole People there were fome ftung by Serpents, and running together for prefent Cure, others Aftonished at the newness of the Miracle, and all Celebrating with all kind of Praise the immenfe and incredible Goodness of God : when they perceive that the Pain of that deadly Wound was not taken away, either by Medicaments, with the Torment of the Patient, by the Phylicians Labour, and affiduous Carefulness of Friends, nor by any long space of time, but reduced unto Health in a moment. Compare now a King with that Serpent, and fo compare him, that you may reckon a good King amongst the greatest Benefits of God, who alone, without any Expence of thine. and without thy Pains and Labour, doth relieve a Kingdom of all its Troubles, fetleth Perturbations, and in a fhort space bringeth the Inveterate Ulcers of Minds unto a Cicatrice or Scar; neither is he only a Procurer of Health to those who behold him near at hand, but also to fuch as are a far off, and have no hope to fee him, in whole Image fo great a Force is prefented to the Minds of his Subjects, that it doth eafily perform what the Prudence of Lawyers, the Science of Philosophers, and the Experience of fo many Ages, in collecting their feveral Arts, could never perform. Now that great Honour, Dignity, Eminency or Majefty can be told or excogitate to be in any Man, that by Speech, Converfe, Sight, Fame and a tacite Species prefented to the Mind, he may reduce the most Luxurious to Modesty, the Violent to Equity, and those that are Furious unto a right Mind. Can you ask of God a greater Benefit than this, fo much for the Good of Mans Concerns ? If I miltake not, this is the true Reprefentation of a King, not that of a King guarded with Weapons of War, ever fearing others, or making others afraid, by his Hatred towards his People, measuring his Peoples Hatred against him. This Representation which we have gived, Seneca in his Thyestes hath expressed in very pleasant Colours, which Verse I doubt not but you know, feeing it is most elegant. Do I now feem to speak basely and contemptuoully of a King, and bind him falt loaded with the Fetters of Laws within a Goal, as you did lately fay? And not rather to bring him forth into Light and Affemblies of Men, and fet him upon the publick Theatre of Mankind ? Accompanied not with the arrogant Company of Archers and Armed Men, and Rogues cloathed in Silk, but guarded in Safety by his own Innocency, not with the Terrour of Arms, but by the Love of his People : and not only at Freedom and fet aloft, but honour-honoured, venerable, facred and eminent, and coming forth with the good Wifhes and fortunate Acclamations of the People, and whitherfoever he goeth, turning the Faces, Eyes and Hearts of all towards him. What Acclamation, or what Triumph can be compared with this daily Pomp? Or if God in humane likenefs fhould come down into Earth, what greater Honour could be given him by Men, than that which would be given to a true King, that is to the lively Image of God? For neither can Love beftow, nor Flattery invent a greater Honour than this. What do you think of this reprefentation of a King?

M. So fplendid and magnificent indeed it is, that it feems nothing can be faid or imagined more magnificent. But in these corrupt times of ours, it is hard to find this magnanimity, unlefs careful Education make an honeft and good Nature and Difpolition. For the mind being principled with good inftructions and Acts from Infancy, and by Age and daily Practice confirmed, endeavours by Vertue to attain to true Glory, in vain it is tempted by the allurements of Lufts, or weakned by the impreffions of Adversity. For thus Learning doth perfect natural Parts, and good Breeding doth ftrengthen the mind : So that it findeth occasion of exercifing Vertue amongst the very Recreations of Pleasures, and these things which ufually terrifie weak ones, by reafon of difficulty, Vertue doth account them as a matter of praife. Seeing then there is fo great importance in Learning for all conditions of Life, with what great Care and Solicitude flould Men forefee, that the tender minds of Kings be rightly principled, even from their very Infancy. For feeing many are the benefits of good Kings towards their Subjects, and contrariwile, many Calamities proceed from wicked Princes, then nothing doth feem to have a greater influence upon every Rank of Men, than the carriage and conversation of Kings and others, who joyntly rule publick Affairs. For what is done well or ill by private Perfons, is for the most part hid from the multitude: Or by reason of such Mens obscure condition their example belongeth to few. But all the words and deeds of those, who hold the Helm of publick Affairs, cannot be concealed, being written as it were in a publick Monument, as Horace faith, but are fet before all Men for imitation. For they do not turn Mens affections to themfelves by Studying to pleafe them, but by very kind Allurements of utility. And whitherfoever the inclinations of Kings do drive, they make the publick Discipline wheel about with them. But I am afraid that our Kings will not not be intreated to perform what you have now mentioned." For they are fo marred by the Allurements of pleafures, and deceived with the false shew of Honour, that I think they do almost that which some Poets F

Poets report to have befallen the Trojans who were in company at Sea with Paris. For the true Helena being left in Ægypt with Protheus a Holy and true religious Man, they did contend fo Pertinacioufly the space of Ten Years for her likeness, that it was the end of a most pernicious War, and of the most Flourishing Kingdom in those times. For impotent Tyrants embracing that falle representation of a Kingdom, when they have once obtained it by right or wrong, cannot loofe it without deftruction. Now if any do admonish them, that the true Helena for whom they imagine to fight, is elfewhere concealed, they would call him mad. B. I am indeed glad that you fomewhat understand the Beauty of that true Daughter of Jupiter from this her likeness, fuch as it is, albeit you do not see her self. But if these Lovers of that Helena, to their great damage, did see the perfect Image of the true Helena, pourtracted with her lively Colcurs by fome Protegenes or Apelles, I do not question but they would admire her and fall in Love with her. And if they did not command their affections to enjoy that other, they might fall into thole grievous punifhments, which Perfius in his Satyres doth imprecate on Tyrants. O Supream Father of the Gods, be pleafed thus to pun ih cruel Tyrants, when any execrable Lust dipt in raging Poyson doth ftir up their spirits, let them see what Vertue is, and let them pine away for forrow, because they despised her. And therefore seeing we are fallen in to make mention of Tyrants, may it please you, that straight way we proceed to speak of them? M. Yea, unless you think some other thing should be first spoken. B. I suppose we shall not deviate, if we proceed in the fame Foot-fteps for finding out a Tyrant, wherein we did infift in feeking out a King. M. I think fo. For by that means we shall very eafily understand what difference there is betwixt them, if set one against another they be duly confidered. B. And first of all, that we may begin at a Tyrants name, of what Language, it is uncertain. I therefore think it now necessary for us to feek therein the Greek or Latin Etymology. Now what the Ancients did call Tyranny, I think is not unknown to any who are well verfed in humane literature. For Tyrants were called both by the Greeks and Latins; who had the full Power of all things in their hands, which Power was not aftricted by any Bonds of Laws, nor obnoxious to the cognition of Judges. Therefore in both Languages, as you know, not only the Noble Heroes, and most Famous. Men, but the chiefest of the Gods, and so Jupiter also is called Tyrannus : And that even by those who both think and speak Honourably of the Gods. M. I know indeed that well enough; and the rather I much admire, whence it is come to pass, that that name now for so many Ages is accounted

B. It counted Odious, and alfo amongst the most grievous reproaches. feems certainly to have fallen out in this word, which happeneth to be in many others; for if you confider the nature of Words, it hath no evil in it. And albeit fome words have a more pleafant found in the Ears of Hearers, and others a more unpleasant, yet of themselves they have no fuch thing, fo as to ftir up the mind to Wrath, Hatred, or Hilarity, or otherwife to Create pleasure or pain and trouble. If any fuch thing befal us, that happens to fall out ufually, not from the Word. but from the confuetude of Men, and Image thereof conceived by the Hearers. Therefore a Word which amongst some Men is honest, amongst others cannot be heard with fome Preface of, with reverence. M. I remember that the like is befallen the names of Nero and Judas, whereof the one amongst the Romans, and the other amongst the Jews was accounted by great Men very Famous and honourable. But thereafter by no fault of these names, but of these two Men, it hath come to pass, that even the most flagitious Men will not have these names to be given their Children: They being Buried under fuch infamy. B. The fame also is perspicuous to have befallen the Word Tyrane, for it is credible, that the first Magistrates, who were thus called, were good Men; or from hence, that this name was fometime fo Honourable, that it was attributed to the Gods. But those that came afterwards made it so infamous by their wicked Deeds, that all Men abhorred it as Contagious and Pestilentious, and thought it a more light reproach to be called an Hangman than a Tyrant. M. Perhaps it was the fame as befell the Kings in Rome after the Tarquinii were deposed in the name Distator after M. Antonius and P. Dolabella were Confuls. B. Just fo. And on the contrary, base and vulgar names have been made Famous by the Vertue of Men called thereby. As amongst the Romans, Camillus, Metellus, Scropha ; and amongst the Germans, Henry, Genserick, Charles. This you shall the better understand, if taking away the name of Tyrant, you confider the thing, notwithstanding that this kind of Government hath continued in its former Honour and Refpect amongst many Famous Nations, as the Afymnete amongst the Grecians, and the Dictators amongst the Romans: For both were lawful Tyrants. Now Tyrants they were, being more powerful than the Laws; but lawful they were, as being chosen by confent of the People. M. What am I hearing ? Tyrants and yet lawful ? Indeed I did expect a far other thing from you; but now you feem to confound the differences of all Kings and Tyrants. B. Indeed both Kings and Tyrants amongift the Ancients feem to have been altogether one and the fame, but I fuppose in divers Ages : For I think the name of Tyrants was more Ancient ; there-thereafter when they became weary of the name, in their place fucceeded Kings by a more plaufible name, and more gentle Government; and when they also began to degenerate, the moderation of Laws were adhibited, which might fet limits to the boundless Lusts of their Government. Now Men according to the exigence of times, and their usual way, feeking out New Remedies became weary of the Old way of Government, and fought out New ways. Now our prefent purpole is to handle both kinds of Government, namely that wherein as well the Government of Kings as of Laws is the most powerful ; and the worst kind of Tyranny, wherein all things are contrary to a Kingdom, and have undertaken to compare them one with another. M. It is fo. And I earnestly expect you would fall upon that. B. At first then we had agreed, that a King was Created for maitaining humane Society, and we determined his Office and Duty, that by the prefcript of Laws he fhould allow every Man his own. M. I do remember that. B. First then, he that doth not receive a Government by the will of the People, but by force Invadeth it, or intercepteth it by fraud, how thall we call him ? M. I fuppofe, a Tyrant. B. There be also many other differences, which I fhall briefly run through, becaufe any Man may eafily Collect them from Ariftotle : For the Government of Kings is according to Nature, but that of Tyrants is not. A King doth Rule his Subjects, and Reign over them by their own Consent. Tyrants Reign over them, nill they will they. A Kingdom is a principality of a Free Man among Free Men : Tyranny is a principality of a Mafter over his Slaves. For defence of a Kings fafety the Subjects Watch and Ward, for a Tyrant Forrainers do Watch to oppress the Subjects. The one beareth Rule for the Subjects well-fare, the other for himfelf. M. What do you fay of those who have gotten into their hand the Supream Authority by Force and without the Peoples Confent, and yet for many Years did fo Rule, that the People were not weary of their Government? For what could be wanting in Hiero the Syracufan King, or in Cofmo de Medices the Borentine Duke to make them just Kings, except the Peoples suffrages? B. Indeed we cannot exempt them out of the number of Tyrants. For it was Nobly spoken by a notable Historian, albeit you may indeed Rule your Countryand Friends by Violence and Force, and Correct their Faults, yet it is unfeafonable. Then again, fuch do feen to do just like Robbers, who cunningly dividing their ill gotten Goods, do feek the praife of Justice by injury, and of liberality by Robbery, yet do not obtain what they hunt for; by the odiousness of one ill deed they loofe all the thanks of their Oltentative bounty, and fo much the less affurance of their Civil disposition do they give their Subjects, iests, and that because they do not that for their Subjects good, but for their own Government, namely, that they the more fecurely may enjoy their own Lufts and Pleasures, and effablish a foveraignty over the Posterity to come, having fomewhat mitigated the Peoples hatred. Which when they have once done, they turn back again to their old For the fruit which is to follow may eafily be known by manners. the fowre thereof. For he hath the fame ftrength and power to revoke all things at his pleafure, and to transfer unto himfelf the ftrength of all Laws, even as if he would abrogate all Laws. But this kind of Tyrants had been perhaps tolerable, if without the common deftruction of all it could have been taken away, even as we do endure fome bodily Difeafes, rather than throw our life into the hazard of a doubtfome Cure. But they who bear rule, not for, their Country's good, but for their own felf interests, have no regard to the publick utility, but to their own pleafure and luft, they place the ftability of their Authority in the Peoples weaknels, and think that a Kingdom is not a procuration concredited to them by God, but rather a prey put into their hands. Such are not joyned to us by any civil Bond, or Bond of humanity, but should be accounted the greatest Enemies of God and of all Men. For all the actions of Kings should aim at the publick fafety of their Subjects, and not at their own wealth. By how much Kings are raifed above other Men, fo much fhould they imitate the Celeftial Bodies, - which having no good offices of ours given to them; yet do infuse on human Affairs a vital and bountiful vertue of heat and light. Yea the very Titles wherewith we have honoured Kings (if you remember) might put them in mind of their Munificence. M. Me thinks I remember, namely that they fhould use a Paternal indulgence towards their Subjects committed to them as towards Children; the care of a Shepherd in procuring their profit; as Generals in maintaining their fafety, as Governours in excellency of Vertues, and as Emperours commanding those things which might be useful, B. Can he then be called a Father who accounts his Subjects Slaves? or a Shepherd, who doth not feed his Flock, but devoureth them? or a Pilot who doth always study to make fhipwrack of the goods in his Ship, and who as (they fay) makes a Leek in the very Ship wherein he fails? M. By no means. B. What is he then, who doth not Rule for the Peoples good, but still doth all for himself, who doth not strive with good Men in Vertue, but contendeth to exceed the most flagitious wretch in Vices? who leadeth his Subjects into manifest Snares? M. Indeed fuch fhall not by me be accounted either a General, or Emperour, or Governour. B. If you then shall fee any usurping the name name of a King, and in no kind of Vertue excelling any of the People but inferior to many therein, not fatherly affectionate towards his Subjects, but rather oppreffing them by arrogant domineering, and that thinketh the People is concredited to him for his own gain, and not for their safeguard. Will you imagine that such a Man is truely a King, albeit he goes vapouring with a great many in Guard about him, and openly be feen with gorgeous Apparel, and make a fhew of Punifhments? can he conciliate the People, and catch their applause by Rewards, Games, Pompous fhews, and even mad underminings, and whatever is thought to be Magnificent? will you, I fay, account fuch a Man a King? M. Not indeed, If I would understand my felf aright. but void of all human fociety. B.Within what limits do you circumfcribe human fociety ? M.Within the very fame limits wherein by your preceding difcourse you seemed to include it, namely within the Hedg of Laws. Which whofoever trangress, be they Robbers, Thieves, or Adulterers. I fee them publickly punished, and that to be accounted a just cause of their Punishment, because they transgreffed the limits of human society. B. What fay you of those, who would never once enter within these hedges? M. I think they fhould be accounted Enemies to God and Men, and reckoned amongst Wolves, or some other kind of noisome Beasts, rather than amongst Men: which whosoever doth nourish, he nourifheth them for his own destruction and others : and wholoever killeth them, doth not only good to himfelf, but to all others. 'But if I had power to make a Law, I would command (which the Romans were wont to do with Monsters) such kind of Men to be carried away into sclatary places, or to be drowned in the depths of the Sea, a far from the fight of any Land, left by the Contagion of their Carcaffes they might infect other Men. And rewards to the killers of them to be differned not only by the whole People, but by every particular Perfon; as ufeth to be done to those who have killed Wolves or Bears, or apprehended their Whelps. For if fuch a Monster should be Born, and speak with a Mans voice, and have the Face of a Man, and likeness of other Parts. I would have no fellowship with him; or if any Man develted of humanity should degenerate into such cruelty, as he would not meet with ether Men but for their deltruction. I think he fhould be called a Man no more than Satyrs, Apes, or Bears, albeit they should refemble Man in countenance, gesture and speech. B. Now if I mistake not, you understand what a King, and what a Tyranat the wifest Antients meant in their Writings. Will it please you then that we propose some Idea of a Tyrant alfo, fuch as we gave in speaking of a King? M. Yes, that I do do earnestly defire, if it be not a trouble to you. B. You have not forgot, I suppose, what by the Poets is spoken of the Furies, and by our Divines of the Nature of evil spirits, namely, that these spirits are Enemies of Mankind, who whilft they are in perpetual Torments, yet do rejoyce in the Torments of Men. This is indeed the true Idea of Tyranny. But becaufe this Idea can only be differned in the imagination, but not by any of the fenfes, I shall fet before you another Idea, which not only the Mind may difern, but the fenfes also perceive, and as it were reprefented to the very Eye. Imagine you fee a Ship toffed by Waves in the Sea, and all the Shoars round about not only without Haven or Harbour, but also full of most cruel Enemies, and the Master of the Ship in contest with the Company, and yet to have no other hope of fafety than in their fidelity, and the fame not certain, as knowing well that he puts his life into the Hands of a most barbarous kind of Men, and void of all humanity, whom by Money he may hold trufty, and who for greater gain may be conduced to fight against him. Such indeed is that life which Tyrants embrace as happy. They are afraid of Enemies abroad, and of their Subjects at home, and not only of their Subjects, but of their Domesticks, Kinsfolks, Brethren, Wives, Children and near Relations. And therefore they have always War, either a Foreign War with their Neigbours, Civil War with their Subjects, or a Domestick War within doors, or else they are still in fear thereof. Neither do they expect aid any where but by a Mercenary way, they dare not hire good Men, nor can they truft bad Men; what then in all their life can be to them pleafant? Dionyfus would not let his Daughters once become Women to trim him, fearing to let the Razor come to his Throat. Temoleon was killed by his own Brother, Alexander Pharaus by his own Wite, and Sp. Caffias. by his own Father. He that still hath fuch Examples fet before his Eyes, what a Torture do you imagine he carrieth about in his Breast? Seeing he thinks that he is the mark fet for all Mankind to fhoot at. Neither is he only, while awake, tormented with these tortures of Confcience, but also is awakned out of his Sleep by terrifying fights both of living and dead, and agitated by the Firebrands of hellish Furies. For the seafon which Nature doth grant for reft to all Creatures, and alfo to Men for relaxation of their Cares, to him is turned into horrours and punishment. M. Forsooth you have handled these things very acutely, but I know not if truly also, but yet, if I miltake not, they make not fo much for our purpofe. For

For they who have the power to choose what Kings they please, in them is the power to bind by Laws fuch as they have chosen. But'you know that our Kings are not chosen, but born Kings. To whom I have always thought it to be no lefs hereditary, that their will and pleafure fhould fland for Law, than the Kingdom itfelf. Nor am I rashly induced to be of this opinion, but convinced by feveral great Authors, with whom I am not ashamed to be miltaken, (if at all I be in any miltake or errour.) For not to make mention of others, Lawyers do affirm, that by the Royal Law which is made for the Government of Kings, all the Peoples Power is fo transmitted into them, that their will and pleasure fhould be accounted for Laws. And indeed from this Law did those threatnings of a certain Emperour arise, that he would quite take away from Lawyers all their fciences, wherein they fo much. boaft, by one Edict. B. You do very well, that whilft you cite, a most wicked Author of one of the greatest deeds, thought good to suppress his name. For that was C. Caligula, who willed but one Neck for all the people of Rome. Now in that Emperour there was nothing of a man, far less of a King, belide his ftape, you are not then ignorant how much Authority may be due to him. But as for the Royal Law, what it is, when, by whom, and in what words it was made the very Lawyers make no mention. For that power was never in any of the Roman Emperours, feeing from them appeals were made to the people. But that ordinance, whereby L. Flaccus having oppreffed the Liberty of the People of Rome, eftablished by the filence of other Laws; the Tyranny of L. Sylla, no man did ever hold for a Law. For of that ordinance fuch was the ftrength, that whatever L. Sylla had done, should be ratified. Which Law never any free people was fo infatuate, as willingly to permit to be imposed on them. Or if any fuch were, he were indeed worthy to ferve perpetually Tyrants, and be punified for his folly. But if any fuch Law have been, let us think it was an example proposed to us for caution, but not for imitation.

M. Indeed you admonifh well. But that admonition belongeth to them in whole power it is to create fuch Kings as molt pleafe them, but to us it doth not at all belong, who do not by fuffrages elect the beft Kings, but accept of those that by chance are given us. That allo of a certain Lawyer seems properly to quadrate with us, who have given to our Kings Ancestors that right and authority over us and our posterity, that they and their posterity rity thould perpetually hold their Empire and Authority over us. I wish then you had admonished them (I mean our Ancestors) who once had it in their own power entirely to admit such Kings as . they pleafed. But now that Counfel of yours too late ferves only for this, not to amend the faults that are not in our power, but deplore our Ancestors folly, and acknowledge the milery of our condition. For what can be left to those that are made flaves, but to be punished for other mens folly? And that our punishment may be made more light, let us affwage them by patience: let us not provoke their wrath, by tumultuating importunely, whole dominion over us we cannot cast off, nor diminish their power, nor flee from their force or weaknels. Now that Royal Law, to which you are so much an Adversary, was not made in favour of Tyrants, as you would have it seem to be, because it was approved by Justinian a very just Prince. With whom so plain flattery would not have had place. For with a foolifh Prince that of the Poet would prevail whom do th false honour help, or lying infamy terrify, but a lend man and a lyar ? B. Indeed Justinian, as Hiftory reports, was a great mighty Man albeit fome do report him to have been cruelly ingrate to Bellisarius. But let him be such as you judge he was, yet you may remember, that it is recorded by some almost of that same age with him, that Tribonius, a chief Man amongst the compilers of these Laws, was a very wicked Man, and fo might eafily be induced to gratify alfo a very bad Prince. But even good Princes do not hate this kind of flattery. For Even those who will not kill any man, do yet desire to have it in their power, and there is nothing which he dare not believe of himself, seeing his pomer equal to that of the Gods is commended. But let us return to our own Princes: to whom you fay the Kingdom doth come by inheritance and not by fuffrages. Now of our own only I speak, for if I shall digress to speak of Foreign Princes, I fear lest our discourse become more prolixe than we intended. M. I think you fhould do fo. For Foreign Affairs do not much belong to our dispute in hand. B. That I may therefore begin at the first Principles. This is sufficiently agreed upon, that our Princes were chosen for their Vertue, who should govern others. M. So d) the Writers of our Affairs record. B. Nor is this less known, that many who have Reigned cruelly and wickedly have been called to account by their Subjects : fome adjudged to perpetual Imprifonment, others punished partly by exile, and partly by death, against whose killers no Inquisition was ever G made.

made, even when their Sons or Kinsmen were assumed into their ftead. But who ever had killed good Kings, were more feverely punished, so as no where else was murther more severely revenged. And because it would be tedious to rehearse every one, I shall produce some few of these last Kings, whole memory is most recent. The nobility did fo grievously punish the Murther of Fames the First, (having left as heir his Son of fix years of age) that by a new and exquisit kind of punishment they put to death feveral Perfons of very Eminent Families, and Peers of the Land, both for wealth and vaffalage eminent : On the contrary, who did condole the death of James the Third, a Man flagitious and cruel? far less revenge it? But in the death of James the Fourth his Son, the suspition of the Crime was punished with death neither were our Anceftors pioufly inclined towards good Kings, but also gentle and merciful toward wicked Kings For when one of King Culen's Enemies had killed him in his journey, whilft he is coming to give an account of his Administration, he was feverely punished by a fentence of the Eftates of Parliament. And likewife was punified as an Enemy, he who had killed Evenns in Prifon, who had been adjudged to perpetual bonds. And the violent death or particide of him they punished, whose wicked and vicious life all men had hated. M. I do not fo much inquire at present what some time hath been done, as by what right Kings Reign amongst us. B. That we may therefore return thereunto, as in our first Kings until Kenneth the Third, who first sched the Kingdom in his own Family, it is very clear what was the peoples power in creating their Kings, and taking order with them, even To it is neceffary we know, that he either did that against the peoples will, or by perswasion obtained it. M. That cannot be denied. B. Moreover, If by force he compelled the people to obev him, then how foon the people began to have confidence in their own ftrength, they might have caft off that violent yoke of Government imposed upon them: Seeing all Laws received by Kings and People do pronounce, and nature it felf doth call for it, that whatever is done by force and violence, may be undone by the like violence. M. What if the people being by fraud circumvented, or by feat forced did furrender themselves into that Slavery : what for excufe can be pretended, but that they perpetually continue in that cafe, into which it was once agreed they were to be in? B. If you debate with me from that agreement, what excule there is for undoing the fame. I shall on the other hand lay down fome reasons why pactions and agreements greements may be diffolved. And first of all, fuch as are made through force or fear, in all Common-wealths, concerning these there is a fure Law, drawn from Natures spring. Laws allow restitution to be fully made to fuch as are by fraud circumvented, and think that it should be kept for Pupils, and fuch other Perfons, who by just Law they would have to be defended. What Affembly therefore of Men can require more justly to have reflitution, then a whole people ? to whom the wrong is done, which indeed is not done against one part of the Common-wealth. but floweth far abroad into all the Members of that politick Body. M. I know this Law to be made use of in the cases of private Perfons, nor is it unjust. But there is no necessity we should debate herein, seeing it is far more credible (which is recorded by Hiforians) that that right was by the peoples will granted to Kings. B. It is also credible that so great a matter was not obtained without some great cause. M. I do easily affent thereto. B. What do you think was the chief caule thereof? M. What other, except that which is recorded ? wearifomnels of ambition, Tumults, Murthers, inteffine Wars, often with the utter destruction of the one party, and always with very great damage of both. For such as did obtain the Government, endeavoured to cut off their Brethren, and almost all their near Kinsmen, that they might leave the Government the more peacable to their Children, even as we hear is done amongst the Turks, and as we see amongst the chief of the Clanns in our Islands, and in Ireland. B. To which of the two do you think was that contention most pernicious, to the People or to the Princes? M. Certainly to the Kings, feeing the greatest part of the people securing themselves doth usually stand Spectators of Princes contests, and yield always as a prey to the Victors. B. It feems then that Princes rather for themselves, than for the good of the people defired to establish the Kingdom in their own Family. M. That is very probable. B. Now that they might obtain that which did fo much concern the perpetual dignity, wealth and fafety of their Family, it is probable, that they did dispense or remit to one another somewhat of their right: and that they might the more eafily obtain the peoples good will, liking and confent, they on their part gave them fome ease. M. I believe that. B. You will certainly confess it incredible, that for fo great a benefit bestowed on their Kings, they should endure to be in a worse case than formerly they were in. M. It is altogether incredible. B. Neither would Kings have de-G 2 fired fired it with fo great Ambition, if they had known it would prove huttful to their Children, and upprofitable to the people. M. Not at all. B. Imagine then that fome one in Parliament of the free people did treely ask the King, what if to any King should fucceed a Son that is a fool, or mad? Will you let fuch over us to Rule us, who cannot rule or govern themfelves? M. I think there was no need to make use of that exception, seeing by the Laws it is provided against such a case. B. Well said indeed. Let us then see, if Kings had obtained from the people a free power over the Laws, whether that had been unprofitable, especially to those who defired to forefee the good of their own Family in time coming. M. Why shall we think that that Power would be unprofitable? B. Becaufe nothing doth fo much contribute for the continuance of a Government, as that temperament of Government, feeing it is both honourable for Kings, and moderate, and fafe for the people. The mind of Man hath fomewhat sublime and generous imbred therein by nature, that it will obey none, unless he govern profitably: Nor is there any thing more prevalent for maintaining humane fociery, than the mutual exchange of benefits, and therefore Theopompus feems to have wifely answered his Wife upbraiding him that by adding the Epbory he had diminished the Power of his Authority, and had left the Kingdom to his Sons lefs than he had gotten it. It is, faith he, fo much the more firm and fure. M. What you relate of continuance, I perceive is most true. For I think the Kingdoms of the Scots and Danes are the most Ancient of all that are in Eirope, nor do, they feem by any other means to have attained that antiquity, than by the moderation of the Supream Authority, whill in the mean time the Kingdoms of the Frenches, Engliftees and Spaniards have past to often out of one Family into another. But I do not know if our Kings have been fo wife as Theopompus. B. As they have not been fo prudent, do you imagine that the people were to foolifh, as to neglect an occasion to opportune put into their hand? or that they were fo firuck with fear, or feduced by flatteries, as to give themselves over into flavery willingly? M. Perhaps it was not. But if the people (which indeed might be) were to blind, that they did not fee what might concern their own good, or being carelels would not fee what might be for their benefit, fo as to contemn it, should they not then be justly punished for their folly ? B. It is not probable, that any fuch thing was done, feeing we may fee the contrary to bc be observed even to o 1: days. For best les that wicked Kings, as often as they intended Tyramy over their Subjects, were always reflrained. Tome Veftiges of the Ancient Cuftoms do vet continue in fome Ancient Families. For the Old Scots even to our very days do choose their Heads of Clans, and having cholea them, do give them a Council of Elders, to which Council whof ever gives not Obedience, is deprived of all Honour and Dignity. What therefore is with very areas care observed in the parts, would they be negligent of for the fecurity and fafety of all? And would they willingly redact themselves into Bondage to him, who was to poffels a lawful Kingdom inftead of fome benefit? and would they freely give over their Liberty acquired by vertue, defended by arms. not interrupted for fo many Ages, to one not expecting it, without force, without War: For the calamity of John Baliol doth flew that that power was never granted to our Kings, belides the punilhments fo often taken for their Male-administration. Who about two hundred and fixty years ago was by the Nobility rejected, becaufe he had fubjected himfelt and his Kiugdom to the authority of Edward King of England, and Robert the first was substitute in his stead. The same doth also shew that perpetual Cuftom continued from the beginning of our Government.

M. What cultom do you speak of ? B. When our Kings are publickly inaugurated they folemnly promife to all the people, that they will observe the Laws, Rites and old Statutes of their predeceffors and use the fame power which they have received from them, that whole order of ceremonies doth fhew, and the first entry of our Kings into every City, from all which it may be eafily understood, what kind of power they did receive from out predeceffors, to wit, none other than that they fwear to maintain the Laws being cholea by fuffrages. This condition of reigning did God propole to David, and his posterity, and promileth they should reign to long, as they should obey the Laws he had given them, those things indeed they do, as is probable that our Kings received from our Ancestors a power not immense, but within certain limits bounded and limited. And further there was the confirmation of a long time, and the ufurpation of a perpetual right by the people, never reprehended by a publick decree. M. But I fear it cannot be eafily obtained of Kings as being perfwaded by that probability to condefcend to these Laws however fworn unto, or usurped by the people. B. I also believe, it is no less hard to perswade the people to pass from

from the right received from their Ancestors, approved by the use of fo many ages, and practifed by one continual tenour. I do not think it needful to proceed by conjectures what the people is to do, fince I fee what they have done already. But if by the obstinate pertinacy of both the business they come to Arms. he that prevaileth will give what Law and right he pleafeth to the vanquished : but this will no longer continue than he who is vanquished, having again gathered together his forces. shall take up Arms again. In all which contentions men ufually ftill fight with very great damage of the people, but with the utter overthrow of Kings. For from this Spring do flow all the destructions of all Kingdoms. M. It must needs be fo. B. I have perhaps gone back further than was needful, to the end vou might clearly understand what kind of Government there was amongst us of old. For if I had reasoned with you according to the rigour of the Law, I might have gained my point in a far more compendious way. M. Albeit you have almost fatisfied me already, yet I shall willingly hear what that is. B. I would then have you first of all to answer me this question. Do you not approve the definition of Law fet down by Lawyers, who lay that Law is, that which the people knew when demanded by him to whom the Prerogative of demanding belongeth. M. Indeed I do approve it. B. We have agreed, that the faults of Laws being found out, they may be amended or abrogated by the Law-givers. M. We did fo. B. I suppose you perceive now, that fuch as are born Kings are by the Laws and fuffrages of the people created, no less than those whom we faid were elected in the beginning, and that in receiving of Laws there will not be Remedics wanting in the people, who are the Lawgivers, not only against force and fraud, but also against negligence. M. I perceive that clearly. B. Only here is the difference, that the Law concerning our Kings was made feveral ages before, and when any doth enter into the Kingdom, there uleth to be no new Law made, but the old Law is approved, and ratified. But amongh those who have their meeting of Estates at the Election of every King, the Law uleth to be made, the King created and approved, and to to enter into his Government. M. It is fo. B. Now if you pleafe, let us briefly recapitulate what we are at accord in from the very beginning. So that if ought be rashly approved, it may be retracted. M. I am content. B. First of all then, it feems that a King is created for the Peoples fake, and

and that nothing more excellent is given us of God than a good King, and more Peftilentious than a wicked King. M. Very right. B. We have also faid that a wicked King is called a Tyrant. M. We have faid fo. B. And because there is not fuch plenty of good men, fo as to choose those who may prove good Kings, nor to great a happinels of Birth, as that good Luck may offer us those that are good : if we have not fuch as we would with, yet we have such as either confent hath approved, or chance hath offered. Now the hazard that occureth either in choofing new Kings, or in approving fuch as are given us by Birth, was the caufe that we defired Laws, which might modify the Government of Kings. Now these Laws should be nothing elfe but the express Image (as far as may be) of a good Prince. M. We are at accord in that allo. B. It now remaineth, as I suppose, for us to speak of the Punishment of Tyrants. M. That only feems to remain unfpoken of. B. If then a King break all the Bonds of Laws, and plainly behave himfelf as a publick Enemy, what think you should be done in this cafe? M. Indeed I am at a stand here. For albeit the reasons you have given feem to convince me, that we ought to have no fociety with that King, yet lo great is the strength of a constant custom that in my opinion it hath the ftrength of a Law. Which custom doth so closely cleave to men in their minds, that if at any time it hath brought in an errour, better it is to tolerate it, than to marr the Conflitution of the whole Body, whilft we endeavour to Cure a Difeafe that is but fmall by cuftom. For fuch is the Nature of some discases, that better it is to endure the Pain they bring, than to call for doubtfom remedies, in the applying where of, albeit the Cure may be wrought, yet they bring luch fharp Pains in their Cure, as that the Cure of the Dilease is more pernicious than the Disease /it felf. Next, that which troubles me more is, I fee that Government which you call Tyranny, confirmed by the Word of God, and what you abhorr as the utter overthrow of Laws, God doth call the Law of the Kingdom; the Authority of that paffage of Scripture doth move me more than all the Arguments of Philolophers. If you do not explain this to me, the comments of Men will not be of fo great account with me, but that I may inftantly fall away to the Adverfaries fide. B. You are, as I perceive, in the common errour, and that very grievous, who do endeavour to confirm Tyranny by Tyranny. For how great the Tyranny of cuftom is in the minds of men, wherein wherein it hath taken deepest root, and too often we have found it in this our age. Herodotus an Ancient writer doth give us warning by an old example, but I need not old examples. Be well adviled. Confider with your felf how many things there be of great moment, wherein you following the dictates of reafon have fallen from a cuftom inveterat fo many ages paft, fo that now you might have learned by Domeflick experiments, that there is no cuftom more full of dangers than that which in a publick way they command us to follow. I bid you look well to it round about, how many ruins, and how great flaughters will you fee therein? but if it be more clear (as we fay) then the very light, I need not tarry longer in proving or Illustrating a thing so perspicuous. Now as for that paffage of Scripture, which from the Hiftory of the Kings you rather fignify than explain, beware, I pray you, you think that the things which God doth abhor in the life of Tyrants, are by him allowed to Kings. Now left this be, I bid you first consider what that people sought of the Lord : then what causes of a new petition they had, laftly, what the Lord did answer them. First, they ask a King, but what a King? a Lawful King? fuch a one they had. For Samuel was given them by the Lord, whole Prerogative it was to let a King over them. He had for many years judged them Lawfully according to prefeript of God's Law : but whilft in his old Age his Sons did judge, they did many things wickedly, and judged contrary to the Laws. I fee no reafon why they fhould ask the change, or rather Amendment of the Government, or expect the fame from the Lord, who not long before had quite rooted out the whole Family of Heli, almost for the like cause. What do they ask ? A King, fuch as their Neighbouring Nations had, who at home might be a judge to them, and abroad a leader of their Armies. Now in effect such were Tyrants, for as the People of Asia are of a more servile disposition than those of Europe, so did they the more cafily obey the commands of Tyrants. There is no mention made for ought I know, by an Historian of any Lawful King in Afia. Moveover, it doth eafily appear that a Tyrant, and not a King is there defcibed, in regard the Lord in Deuteronomy had prefcribed to them a form not only different from this in that place cited by you, but also plainly contrary thereto, according to which form Samuel and the other judges had judged fo many years, which whilft they did reject, the Lord complains, that he was by them rejected. M. But the Lord doth not call him Tyrant, tant, but ever King. B. He calls him indeed King: for it is peculiar to the Lord, to use the common Speech of the People, as often as he speaketh to a people. And therefore he maketh use of that word with the Vulgar People : but left an Ambiguous ule thereof might deceive, he doth Eloquently expound what the ule of that word was amongst Neighbouring Nations. M. As that may be true, yet that of the Apofile Paul doth urge us more narrowly, who commands us to pray for the falety of Princes : he is fo far from permitting us to revile Government, much lefs to dethrone fuch as are invefted therewith, or to kill them being thrown down. But what Princes doth he recommend to our Prayers? the most cruel that ever were, Tiberius, Caligula, Class. dins, Nero. For Pauls Epiftles were almost contemporary with them. B. That you make to much account of the Authority in Paul, fo as one Sentence of his hath more weight with you than the writings of all Philosophers and Lawyers, I think you do well: but see that you confider well his judgment, or meaning : for you must not examin the words only, but in what time, to whom, and why he wrote. First then let us see what Payl did write. For he writeth to Titus. Chap. 3. Put them in mind to be Subject to Principalities and powers, and to be ready to every good work. I suppose, you see what end of obedience and subjection he appoints. He likewife to Timothy Chap. 2. Doth write, that we fhould pray for all men, even for Kings, and other Magiltrates, that faith he, we may live a peaceable life in all Godliness and honefty. And here you fee what end of praying he appoints: namely not for the Kings fafety, but the Churches Tranquillity, from which it will be no difficult thing to conceive also the form of Prayer. Now in his Epiftle to the Romans, he doth define a King near to a Logick subtilty, for faith he, he is a Minister to whom the fword is given by God, for punishing the wicked, and for cherishing and relieving the good. For faith Chrissiane, these things are not by Paul written of a Tyrant, but of a true and Lawful Magistrate, who is the Vice-gerent of the true God on Earth, whom whofoever refifteth, doth certainly refift the ordinance of God. Now albeit we ought to prav for wicked Princes, we should not thence conclude, that their vices should not be punished: nor will it more follow that we should not punish the rapines of Robbers, for whom we are allo commanded to Pray. And if we should obey a good Prince, it will not therefore follow that we should not refist a wicked Prince. But if you confider the Η reafon reason which did move Paul to write these things, look that the place or Argument make not much against you. For he wrote this to chastife the rashness of some, who did deny the Authority of Magistrates to be necessary for Christians. For fince the power of Magistrats is ordained against wicked men, that we may all live rightoutly; and an example of Divine Juffice might remain amongst men, they affirmed that there was no use thereof amonglt men, who abhor to much the contagion of vices, as that they are a Law to themfelves. Paul doth not therefore speak of those who bear Rule as Magistrats, but of Magistracy it felf, that is, of the function and office of those who rule: nor yet of one or other kind of Magistracy, but of every form of a Lawful Magistracy. Nor doth he debate with those who think that wicked Magistrates should be restrained, but with those men who deny all Authority of Magiftrates, who abfurdly interpreting Christian liberty, did affirm it to be an indignity for those that were made free by the Son of God, and ruled by the Spirit of God, to be under the power of any man. That Paul might refute their errour, he fheweth, that Magistracy is a thing not only good, but alfo facred, namely an ordinance of God, and for that end inftituted, that the assemblies and incorporations of men might be fo continued, that they might acknowledge Gods benefits towards them, and might forbear to wrong one another. God commanded them to be keepers of his Laws who were conflicuted in dignity. Now if we confels Laws to be good (as indeed they are) and the keepers thereof worthy of Honour, we will be forced to confess that the office of the keepers is a good and profitable thing. But Magistracy is terrible, but to whom ? to the good, or bad ? to the good it is not a terrour : it being to them a defence from injury : but to wicked men it is a terrour : it is not fo to you, who are ruled by the Spirit of God. But you will fay to me, what need have I then to be Subject to Magistracy, if I be the Lords Freeman? yea, that you may approve your felf to be the Lords Freeman, obey his Laws : for the Spirit of the Lord, by whom you boaft to be led and governed, is both the Law-giver, and approver of Magistrates, and also the Author of obedience to Magistrates. We therefore in this will eafily agree together, that there is need of Magistracy even in the best Common-wealths, and that we should every way honour the fame. But if any man think otherwife, we account him mad, infamous and worthy of all Punifament. For he doth plainly contravene the will of God revealed revealed to us in the Scriptures. But as for Caligula, Nero, Domitian, and fuch like Tyrants, why they should not be punished as breakers of divine and humane Law, you have nothing here from Paul, who treats of the power of Magistrates, but not of the wicked Ministers of that power, nor will they be at all Magifirates, if you examine that kind of Tyrants according to Pauls rule. But if any will debate that wicked Princes are also ordained by God, look that this his discourse be not captious. For (as they fay in Proverb) God may put a hard wedge to cleave a hard knot, fo doth he fet up a wicked man for punifhing of wicked men; but no man in his right wits dare affirm, that God is therefore the Author of evil, or wickedness, even as no man is Iguorant that he is the Author of punishing wicked men. A good Magistrates also for the most part chooseth a wicked man to be an hangman for punishing guilty Persons. And albeit indeed that a Magistrate doth allome fuch an hangman for that Office, yet no impunity is granted him of all his mildeeds. Nor will the Magistrate have him to be fo above the Laws, as that he cannot be queftioned thereby. I will not ftay longer upon this similitude, lest Court flatterers cry out that I speak basely of the supream Magistrate. But however they exclaim, certainly this they cannot deny, that the hangmans function is a part of the publick Office, and perhaps of the Royal Office, or at least by the Testimony of very Kings; who complain that their Majefty and Person is wronged, as oft as any of their publick Ministers is wronged, or violence done to them: Now the punifhment of wicked Malefactors, and whatever elfe of that kind, doth belong to the Kings office. What fay you of Majors or Provofts in Towns? what of Generals of Armies? what of Baillies ? What of Sherifs ? doth not Paul command us to be fubject to them ? doth he hold them for private perfons? Now an account ufeth to be taken for male-administration of all, not only of Inferiour Magiltrates, but also of such as are equal to Kings. I would therefore have them, who from Pauls words do dream that fo great a power is given to Kings, to fhew me from him, that Kings only are here to be underftood by the name of power, and therefore they only are to be exempted from the Punifhment of Laws: or if, when we fay powers, other Magistrates be also understood by the fame Author, who are ordained by God for the fame use I would have them alfo to fhew me, where all Magifirates are loofed from the Laws, and pronounced free from the fear of Punish- H_{γ} ment :

ment : or if this immunity be granted to Kings only, but denyed to others who are fet in Authority. M. But Paul will have all to be fubject to the higher powers. B. He commandeth fo indeed, but by this name of Power he muft needs comprehend other Magiftrates, unlefs perhaps we imagin that Paul doth think no Power at all to be in those Common-wealths, which have not Kingly Government, but plainly an Anarchy therein. M. I do not believe that, nor is it probable : and the rather I am of this opinion, because the current of all the most learned Interpreters on the place make for you if who think that Pauls dispute there was against those that affirmed that no Laws and Magiftrates did at all belong to them. B. What fay you to that which I lately spoke. Do you think, that those Tyrants before mentioned of all men the most cruel, are meant by the Apostle ?

M. Yes, but what produce you against me to hinder me from the belief thereof? especially leing Jeremy doth carnestly advise the Fens, and that by command of God, to obey the King of Affyria, and by no means to reject his autority, and thence they infer by the like reason, that obedience should be given to other Tyrants also how cruel soever. B. That I may answer first to what you last spoke you must take notice, that the Prophet doth not command the Jers to obey all Tyrants, but the King of Affyria alone : Now if you would conclude the Form of a Law from that which is commanded to be done to one fingle Person, first you are not ignorant (for Logick hath taught you that) what a great abfurdity you will make, next you will be in danger to be affaulted by the oppolers of Tyranny with the like weapons; for you must either shew what fingular thing there is in that matter or propole it to be imitated by all every where, or if you cannot do this, you must acknowledge, that whatever is enjoyned concerning any one Perlon by any special command of God, it doth alike belong to all. If you thall once admit this (which you must needs do) it will be instantly objected, that Abab was killed by Gods command, and a reward was alfo promifed and performed to him that fhould kill him. Whenever therefore you betake your felf to that refuge you must obey all Tyrants : because God by his Prophet did command his People to obey one Tyrant. It will be inftantly replyed, that all Tyrants ought alio to be killed, because Ahab at the command of God was killed by the Captain of hisboft. I herefore I advife you to provide a more firm defence from Scripture for Tyrants, or then laying the fame a fide at prefent you may have your recourse to the Philosophers, phers School. M. I shall indeed think upon it. But in the mean time let us return from whence we have digreffed. What do you bring from Scripture, why Tyrants may be lawfully killed. B. First of all I proffer this, that leing it is expressly commanded to cut off wickednels and wicked Men, without any exception of rank or degree, and yet in no place of facred Scripture are Tyrants more spared than private Perfons. Next, that the definition of Powers delivered by Pasl doth not wholly belong to Tyrants, becaufe they accommodate not the strength of their Authority for the benefit of the People, but for fulfilling their own Lufts. Further we fhould diligently confider how much Power Paul doth grant to Bilhops, whole Function he doth highly and truly praife, as being fome way like unto Kings, as far'as the nature of both their Functions can admit. For Bift.ops are Phyfitians of Internal Difeafes, as Kings are Phyfitians of external Distempers and yet he would neither of them to be free from or not liable to the Jurisdiction of the other. And even as Bishops are subject to Kings in the Exercise of their Civil Government, 10 ought Kings obey the Spiritual admonitions of Bishops. Now albeit the amplitude and dignity of Bifhops be fo great, yet no Law divine nor humane doth exempt them from the punifhment of crimes. And to pass by others. The very Pope who is accounted the Bishop of Bishops, who so exalts himself above all Kings, that he should be accounted a certain God amongst them, vet is he not exempted from the Punishment of Laws, no not by his own Canonists, a kind of men very devoted to him. For feing they would think it abfurd that God (for they do not hefitate to call him thus) frould be obnoxious to Mens cenfure, and think it unjust that the greatest crimes and moli filthy abominations should pals uppunished in any, and yet they have found out a way whereby crimes may be punithed, and the Pope accounted facred and inviolable. For the Priviledge of the Pope is one thing, and of that Man who is Pope is another, fay they and whill they exempt the Pope (whom they deny can err) from the cognition of the Laws, yet do they confels him to be a Man obnoxious to vices and punifhment of vices; nor have the more fubtilly than feverely declared their Judgment herein. It would betedious to rehearle, what Popes (to speak after their usual way) what Men perfonating Popes, who not only alive were forced to renounce their Popedom, but being dead were pulled out of their Graves, and thrown into Tibur. But to omit old Histories. The recent memory of Pope Paulthe IV. is freshin our mind, for his own Rome did witnels nels a publick hatred against him by a new kind of Decree. For they vented their Fury (he being by death taken away) against his nearest Kinsfolk, his Statues and painted Images or Pictures. Nor thould this Interpretation feem more subtile, whereby we separate the Power, from the Perlon in Power, than Philolophy doth acknowledge, and the antient Interpreters do approve, nor is the rude multitude and Strangers to fubrile difputing ignorant thereof; for the meerest Tradesmen take it for no blot upon their Trade, if a Smith or Baker be hanged for robbery, but are rather glad that their fociety is parged of such Villains. But if there be any of another mind, I think it is to be feared, that he feems to be rather grieved at those Mens Punishment with whom he is affociate in their Villany, than for the Infamy of their Society. I am of the opinion, if Kings would abandon the Councils of wicked Men and Flatterers, and measure their own Greatness rather by duties of vertue, than by the impunity of evil deeds, they would not be grieved for the Punishment of Tyrants, nor think that Royal Majefty is leffened by whatfoever deftruction of Tyrants, but rather be glad that it is purged from a most filthy blot of wickedness; especially seeing they use to be highly offended with robbers, and that very justly, if any of them in their malefices pretend the Kings Name. M. Forfooth, they have just Cause. But laying these things ande, I would have you go on to the other head you proposed. B. What heads do you mean? M. Namely in what time, and to whom Paul wrote those things, for I defire to know what the knowledg thereof doth make for the argument in hand. B. I shall herein obey you also. And first I shall fpeak of the time, Paul wrote these things in the very. Infancy of the Church, in which time it was not only necessary to be blamelefs, but none was to give occasion to such as fought occasion of reproaching, and unjust causes of staining the Professor of Christianity: Next he wrote to Men of feveral Nations, and fo gathered together into one fociety out of the whole body of the Roman Empire, amongst whom there were but few very rich, yes almost none, who either had ruled, or could rule, or were in any great account amongst their fellow Citizens, they were not lo many in number, and these almost but ftrangers, and for the most part but lately freed of bondage, and others but Tradefinen and Servants. Amongst them there were many who did further pretend Christian Liberty, than the fimplicity of the Golpel could fuffer. Now this company of People out of the promilcuous Multitude, which did won their Living, though meanly, by hard labour, was not to be fo careful of the flate of the Commonwealth wealth, of the Majefiv of the Empire, and of the conversation and duty of Kings, as of the publick tranquility, and their domeftick Affairs, nor could they juftly claim any more, than to lye lurking under the shadow of whatever Government they were under. If that People had attempted to lay hold upon any Part of Government they should have been accounted not only foolish, but mad. Nor fhould they come out of their lurking holes to breed trouble to those that did hold the helm of publick affaits in hand. Immature Licentiousnels was also to be repressed, an unfit Interpreter of Chri. ftian Liberty. What then doth Paul write ? doubtles no new precept but only these usual precepts, namely, that Subjects should obey their Rulers, Servants their Mafters and Wives their Husbands, nor fhould we think the Lords yoke, how light foever, doth liberate us of the bonds of our duty, but with a more attentive mind than before to be bound thereunto, fo that we fhould omit nothing through all the degrees of duties in our relations, that might any wife make for acquiring the favour and good Will of Men. And fo it should come to pals, that the Name of God fhould be well spoken of among the Gentiles because of us, and the Glory of the Gospel more largely propagated. For performing of these things, there was need of publick Peace, the keepers whereof were Princes and Magistrates, albeit wicked. May it please you, that I set before you a manifest reprefentation hereof ? Imagin that one of our Doctors doth write to the Christians, that live under the Turks, to men, I fay, of mean Fortune, fore dejected in mind, weak and few in Number, and exposed to the injuries of all and every one. What elie, Lask you, would he advife them, then what Paul did advife the Church that then was at Rome, or what Jeremy advised the exiles in Affria? Now this is a most fure argument that Paul had a regard to those mens condition to whom he did write, and not to all others, becaufe he diligently fets home the mutual duties of Husbands toward their Wives, of Wives towards their Husbands, of Parents towards their Children, and of Children towards their Parents, of Servants towards their Mafters and of Mafters towards their Servants. And albeit he writes what the duty of Magistrates is, vet he doth not give them any particular compellation, (as he had done in the preceeding relations.) For which cause we shall judge that he gave no other precepts for Kings and others in Authority: especially seeing their lust was to be much more restrained, than that of private perfons? What other caufe may we imagin, than that at that time there were no Kings or Magistrates in the Church to whom he

he might write Imagin that Paul doth now live in our days, wherein not only the People, but Princes also Profel's Christianity. At the fame time let there be some Prince, who doth conceive that not only thould human Laws but allo divine Laws be subject to his luft and pleasure, and who will have not only his decrees, but also his very nods to be accounted for Laws, like that man in the Golpel, who neither did fear God, nor reverence man, who distributs the Church revenues amongst villains and ralcals, if I may fo fay; and doth mock the fincere Worshipers of God, and accounts them but Fools and mad Men, or Fanaticks: what would Paul write of fuch to the Church? If he were like himfelf, he would certainly deny that he should be accounted a Magistrate. He would interdict all Christians to have any communion with him, either in dyet, Speech, or converse, and leave him to the People to be punifhed by the Laws, and would think they did nothing but their duty, if they fhould account him not to be their King, with whom they were to have no Fellowship by the Law of God. But there will not be wanting fome Court-flaves, or Sycophants, who, finding no honest refuge, become fo impudent, as to fay, that God being angry against a people doth set Tyrants over them : whom as hangmen he appoints for punishing them. Which to be true I do confess; yet it is as true, that God many times doth ftir up from amongst the lowest of the people some very mean. and obscure men to revenge Tyranical Pride and weaknes: For God, (as before is faid) doth command wicked men to be cut off: and doth except neither degree, fex, or condition, nor yet any man. For Kings are not more acceptable to him than beggars. Therefore, we may truely aver, that God being alike the Father of all, to whole providence nothing lies hid, and whole power nothing can relift, will not leave any wickedness unpunished. Moreover, another will stand up and ask some example out of Scripture of a King punished by his Subjects : which albeit I could not produce, yet it will not presently follow, that because we do not read fuch a thing therein to have been done, that it should be accounted for an high crime and malifice. I may rehearfe among many Nations very many and found Laws, whereof in holy write there is no example. For as the confent of all Nations doth approve, that what the Law doth command, is accounted juft, and what it forbiddeth, is unjust, to fince the memory of man it was never forbidden, that what fnould not be contained in Laws. should not at all be done. For that servitude was never received. nor nor will the Nature of things to fruitful of new Examples fuffer the fame to be received, that whatever is not by fome Law commanded, or recorded by some famous Example, should be accounted for a great Crime and Malifice. If therefore any man shall ask of me an Example out of the Sacred Scriptures, wherein the Punishment of wicked Kingsis approved, I fhall again ask him, where is the fame reprehended ? But if nothing done without fome Example doth pleafe: how many civil Statutes shall we have continued with us ? how many Laws, for the greatest part thereof is not taken out of any old Example, but established against new Deceits, and that without Example. But we have already answered those that require Examples more than was needful : Now if the Jewish Kings were not punished by their Subjects, they make not much for our purpose in hand. For they were not at first created by the People, but were by God given them. And therefore very juftly, he who was the Author of that Honour, was to punish their Middeeds. But we debate, that the People, from whom our Kings enjoy whatever Priviledge they claim, is more powerful than their Kings; and that the whole People have that fame Priviledge over them, which they have over every one in particular of the whole People. All the Rights and Priviledges of forraign Nations, who live under lawful Kings, do make for us; all the Nations which are fubject to Kings chofen by themfelves, do commonly agree herein, that whatever Priviledge the People hatn given to any, the fame they may require again very justly. All Common-wealths have still retained this Priviledge. Therefore Lentulus, having confpired with Cataline for overturning the Common wealth of Rome, was compelled to renounce his Prætorship, and the Decemviri, the Makers of the Roman Laws, were taken orders with, even whill they eajoyed the Supream Authority; Some Dukes of Venice, and Chilpericus King of France, laying alide their Royal Honours, as private Men, fpent their Days in Monalteries. And not long ago, Chriftiernus King of the Danes, twenty years almost after he was deprived of his Kingdom, did end his Life in Prilon. Now the Dictatorship (which was a Kind of Tyranny) was in the Peoples Power. And this Privilege hath been conftantly observed, that publick Benefices granted amifs, and the Liberty granted to ingrate Perfons fet at liberty (whom Laws do very much favour) might be taken back again. These things we have spoken of forraign Nations, left we alone feem to have usurped any new Priviledge, against our Kings. But as to what doth properly belong to us, the matter might have been handled in few Words. M. What way? For this I am very defirous to hear. B. I might enumerate twelve of more more Kings, who for great Crimes and flagitious deeds, have been either adjudged to perpetual Imprifonment, or escaped the just Punishment of their Wickednefs, either by Exile or voluntary Death. But left any blame me for relating old and obfolete Stories, if I should make mention of Culen, Evan and Ferchard, I shall produce some few wichin the Memory of our Fore-fathers. All the Eftates in a publick Convention, judged Fames the Third to have been justly killed, for his great Cruelty and Bagitious Wickedness towards his Subjects, and did caution that none of them who had aided, confented, or contributed Money, or had been active therein, to be called thereafter into question therefore. Th. t they therefore did judge the Deed to be duly and orderly done, it being once down, doubtless they defired it might be set down for an Example in time coming, furely no lefs than L. Quintius, fitting in Judgment, did commend Servilius Ahalus for having killed before the Bench, Sp. Mellus turning his Back, and refuling to compear into Judgment, and that he was not guilty of Blood-shed, but thought him to be Nobilitate by the Slaughter of a Tyrant, and all Posterity did affirm the fame. What Subject hath ever approved the Slaughter of one affecting Tyranny? What do you suppose would he have done with a Tyrant robbing the Goods of his Subjects, and shedding their Blood ? What hath our Men done ? do not they feem to have made a Law, who by a publick Decree, without any Punifhment, have paft by a flagitious Crime committed, if fuch like fhall happen in time coming? for at most there is no difference, whether you judge concerning that which is done, or make a Law concerning what is to be done. For both ways a Judgment is past concerning the Kind of the Crime, and concerning the Punifhment or Reward of the Actor. M. Thefe things will perhaps have fome weight amongst us. But I know not how other Nations abroad will take them. You fee I must fatisfie them. Not as in a judicial way I were to be called in question for the Crime, but openly amongst all concerning the Fame, not mine (for I am far from any Suspition thereof) but of my Country men. For I am afraid, left forraign Nations will rather blame the Decrees, wherewith you suppose you are fufficiently protected, than the Crime it felf full of Cruelty and Hatred. But you know, if I miltake not, what is ufually spoken according to the Difpolition and Opinion of every one on both hands, concerning the Examples you have proposed. I would therefore (because you feem to have expeded what is past, not fo much from the Decrees of Men, as from the Springs of Nature) you would briefly expound, if you have ought to fay for the Equity of that Law. B. Albeit that may may feem unjust to stand at the Bar to plead amongst Forreigners for a Law approved from the very first Times of our Scots Government by Kings, by the constant Practice of fo many Ages ago, necessary for the People, not unjust for Kings, but lawful, but now at last accused of Illegality; yet for your Sake I shall try it. And as if I were debating with those very Men who would trouble you, I first ask this. What do you think here worthy of Reprehension? Is it the Caufe? why is it fought for ? or is it the Law it felf which you reprehended ? for the Law was fought for repressing the unjust Lusts of Kings. Whoever doth condemn this, must likewife condemn all the Laws of all Nations, for all Laws were delired for the very fame Caufe. Do you reprehend the Law it felf? do you think it lawful that Kings be exempted of, or not liable to the Laws? let us then fee if that be alfo expedient. And for proving that it is not expedient for the People, there needs not many Words. For if in the former Difcourse we have rightly compared a King to a Phyfitian, as it is not expedient for People that Impunity be permitted to a Phylitian for killing whom he pleafeth, fo it is not for the Good of all, that a promifcuous Licence be granted to Kingss for making Havock of all. We have no caule then to be offended with a People, whole chief Power it is in making Laws, if, as they defire a good King to be set over them, even so a Law to be set over a King none of the best. But if this Law be not for the Kings Use or Profit, let us see if the People should be dealt with to remit somewhat of their Priviledge, and of abrogating it not for the fpace of three days, but according to our ufual way we indict a Parliament to meet within forty days. In the mean time, that we may reason together concerning the Law, tell me, doth he feem to refpect the Good of a mad Man, who loofeth his Bonds? M. Not at all. B. What do you think of him who giveth to a Man fick of a Fever, fo as he is not far from Madnels, a Drink of cold Water, though earneftly craving it, do you think he deferveth well of that fick Man? M. But I fpeak of Kings of a found Mind. I deny that there is any need of Medicine for fuch as are in Health, nor of Laws for Kings of a found Mind. But you would have all Kings to feem wicked, for you impose Laws upon all. B. 1 do not think that all Kings are Wicked. Nor do I think all the People to be wicked, and yet the Law in one Voice doth fpeak to the whole People. Now wicked Men are afraid at that Voice, good People do not think it belongs to them. Thus good Kings have no caufe to be offended at this Law, and wicked Kings, if they were wife, would render Thanks to the Law-giver, who hath ordained what he understood would not be J 2 profita-profitable for them, nor to be lawful for them to do. Which indeed they will not do, if fo be they shall once return again to their right Mind. Even as they who are reftored to Health do render Thanks to their Phyfitian, whom before they had hated, becaufe he would not grant their Defires whilft they were fick. But it Kings continue in their Madnefs, whoever doth most obey them, is to be judged their greatest Enemy. Of this fort are Flatterers, who by flattering their Vices, do cherifh and increase their Disease, and at last, together almost with Kings, are utterly ruined. M. I cannot indeed deny, but that fuch Princes have been, and may be reftrained by Law-bonds. For there is no Monfter more violent and more peftiferous than Man, when (as it is in the Poets Fables) he is once degenerated into a Beaft. B. You would much more fay fo, if you confider how many ways a Man becomes a Beaft, and of how many feveral Monsters he is made. Which thing the old Poets did acutely observe and notably express, when they fay that Prometheus, in the framing of Man, did give him some Particle out of every living Creature. It would be an infinite Work for me to relate the Natures of all one by one. But certainly two most vile Monsters do evidently appear in Man, Wrath and Luft. . But what elfe do Laws act or defire, but that these Monsters be obedient to right Reason? and whilft they do not obey Reafon, may not Laws, by the Bonds of their Sanctions reftrain them ? whoever then doth loofe a King, or any other from these Bonds, doth not loose one Man, but throws in against Reafon two Monfters exceeding cruel, and armeth them for breaking afunder the Bars of Laws : To that Aristotle seemeth to have rightly and truly faid, that he who obeyeth the Law, doth obey both God and the Law; but he that obeyeth the King, doth obey both a Man and a Beast. M. Albeit these things seem to be faid appositely enough, yet I think we are in a Miftake two ways. First, because the last things we have fooken, feem not to agree well enough with the first. Next, becaule, as we may well know we feem not to have yet come to the main Point of our Debate. For a little before we were at agreement that the Voice of the King and Law ought to be the fame, here again we make him Subject to the Laws. Now though we grant this to be very true, what have we gained by this Conclusion ? for who thall call to an ac. count a King become a 'Tyrant? for I fear a Priviledge without Strength will not be powerful enough to reftrain a King forgetful of his Duty, and unwilling to be drawn unto Judgment, to answer for Maleadministration. B. I fear ye have not well pondered what we have before debated, concerning the Royal Power. For if ye had well confidered dered it, you had eafily underftood what you now have faid, that betwixt them there is no Contradiction. But that you may the more eafily take it up, first answer we, when a Maziltrate or Clerk doth utter the Wordsof a Proclamation before an Heravid. Is not the Voice of both one and the fame ? I fay of an Herauld, and of a Clerk. M. It is the fame indced. B. Which of the two feens greateft? M. He who first doth utter the Words. What is the King, who is the Author of the Edict? M. Greater than both. B. Then according to this Similitude let us fet down the King, the Law, and the People. The Voice is the fume both of King and Law. Which of the two hath the Authority from the other, the King from the Law, or the Law from the King? M. The King from the Law. B. From whence collect you that? M. Becaufe the King was not fought for to reftrain the Law, but the Law to reftrain the King. And from the Law he hath that, whereby he is a King, for without the Law he would be a Tyrant. B. The Law then is more powerful than the King, and is as a Governels and Moderatrix both of his Luft and Actions. M. That is already granted. B. What, Is not the Voice of the People and the Law the fame ? M. The very fime. B. Which of the two is most powerful, the People or the Law? M. I think, the whole People. B. Why do you think to ? M. Becaufe the People is as it were the Parent of the Law, certainly the Author thereof, they being able to make or abrogate it as they pleafe. B. Seeing then the Law is more powerful than the King, and the People more powerful than the Law, we must fee before which we may call the King to anfwer in Judgment. Let us also difcuss this. Are not the things which for fome others Sake are inftituted, of lefs account than those for whole fake they are required or fought? M. I would have that more clearly explained. B. Follow me thus, is not a Bridle made for the Horfe Sake? M. It is fo. B. Are not Saddles, Girdings and Spurs made for Horfes? M. They are. B. Now if there were no Horfe, there should be no use of fuch things. M. None at all. B. A Horse is then better than all thefe. M. Why not? B. Why a Horfe? for what use is he defired ? M. For very many Ufes, and first of all, for obtaining Victory in War. B. We therefore do esteem the Victory to be of more worth than Horfes, Arms, and other things, which are prepared for the Ufe of War. M. Of more worth indeed it is. B. What did men especially regard in creating a King? M. The Peoples Good, as I suppose. B. But would there be no need of Kings, if there were no Societies of Men? M. None at all. B. The People then is better than the King. M. It must needs be fo. B. If the People be better, they are alfo greater.

greater. M. But when shall we hope for that Happiness, that the whole People agree unto that which is Right. B. That indeed is fcarce to be hoped for. And to expect it, is certainly needless: otherwise a Law could neither be made, nor a Magistrate Created. For neither is almost any Law alike to all, nor is there almost any Man in that Popular Favour, fo as to have no Man either an Enemy to him, or Envious or Slanderer of him; this now is defired, that the Law be useful for the greatest part, and that the greatest part have a good opinion of him that is to be chosen. What if the greatest part of the People may enjoyn a Law to be made, and Create a Magistrate, what doth hinder, but that they also may judge him, and appoint Judges over him? Or if the Tribunes of the People of Rome, and the Lacedemonian Ephori were fought to modifie the Power of Magiftracy, should it seem unjust to any Man, it a Free-People, either upon the like or different account, did foresee their own good in suppressing the bitterness of Tyranny? M. Now I feem almost to perceive what a resple can do: But it is a matter of difficulty to judge what they will do, or appoint to be done. For the greatest part almost doth require Old and usual Customes, and hateth Novelty, which the rather is to be admired, feeing there is fo great an inconftancy in Meat, Apparel, Buildings, and in all Houfhold Furniture. B. Do not think that these things are spoken by me, that I would have any new thing in this kind to be done, but that I might fhew you it hath been of Old, that a King should answer in judgment before Judges, which you did believe to be almost Incredible, or at least a Novelty. For to pass over, how often it hath been done by our Ancestors, as partly before we have faid, and you may also eafily Collect from History; did you never hear of those who contended for the Kingdom to have appealed to Arbiters ? M. I have indeed heard it to have been fometimes done amongst the Persians. B. And our Writers affirm that the same was done by Grimas and Milcolumbus. But least you alledg that that kind of Arbiters were wont to be affumed by the Contenders own confent, let us come to the ordinary Judges. M. Here I am afraid you may as far prevail, as if a Man should spread Nets in the Sea to catch Whales. B. Why fo, I pray you? M. Becaufe all apprehending, reftraint and punifhment is carried on by the more powerful against the weaker. But before what Judges will you command a King to compear ? Before them over whom he hath the Supream Power to judge? Whom he can compefee by this one word, I Forbid? B. What if some greater Power be found which hath that right priviledge or jurifdiction over Kings, which Kings have over others? M. I defire to hear that. B. We told you, if you remember.

member, that this Power is in the People. M. In the whole People indeed, or in the greatest part thereof. Ially yield thus further, that it is in those to whom the People, or the greatest part of them thall transmit that Power. B. You do well, in holding in my pains. M. But you know that the greatest part of the People is corrupted either through fear, or reward, or through fome hope of a Bribe and Impunity, fo as they prefer their own bencht and pleafures or lufts to the publick utility, and alfo fafety. Now there are very few who are not hereby moved : according to that of the Poet. Good People are indeed Rare, scarce fo many in number, as there be Gates in Thebes, or Iffues of the River Nilue, Now all the reft being a naughty Rabble fatned with Blood and rapine enjoy their Venal liberty, and Envy the liberty of others. Now that I may pass from those with whom the name of wicked Kings also is facred. I alfo Omit those, who, albeit they are not ignorant what is lawful and just or right, yet prefer a quiet floathfulness to honest hazards, and helitating in their minds do frame their confultation on the expectation of the Event : or follow the good Fortune of either party, but not the cause. How great this multitude will be, you see. B. Great indeed : but yet not very great. For the wrong of Tyrants may reach many, but their good Deeds very few. For the Avarice of the vulgar is infatiable, as a fire is the more vehemently kindled by adding Fuel thereto : But what is by force taken away from many, doth rather increase the Hunger of fome few, then Satiate their Luft. And further the fidelity of fuch Men for the molt part is unltable : As faith the Poet. Fidelity doth stand and fall with Fortune. But if they would also continue firm in their judgment, they fhould not be accounted in the number of good Subjects, for they are the Violators, or rather Betrayers of humane Society ; which Vice if not fufferable in a King, is far lefs tolerable in a private Perfon. Who then are to be accounted the right Subjects? They who give Obedience to the Laws, maintain and defend humane Society, who rather undergo all pains and Labours, and all Hazards for common Safety, then spend their time Sluggishly in Idleness void of all Honefty; who set before their Eves, not their present enjoyments, but the remembrance of Eternity. But if there be any whom fear and felf interest recal from Hazards, yet the splendor of some notable Atchievment, and the Beauty of Vertue will raife up dejected minds; and those who dare not be Authors or Leaders, will not decline to become Affociates. If therefore Subjects be reckoned, not by number, but by dignity and worth, not only the better part, but also the greater part will ftand for their liberty, honefty and fafety. But if the whole common mon People diffent, this fays nothing to our present debate: For we demand not what is to be done, but what may lawfully be done. But now let us come to the ordinary judicial Sentences. M. That I just now look for. B. If any private Man contend that his inheritance, or fome part of his Land is unjuilily detained by the King, what do you think fhould this private Man do? Shall he pass from his Land, because he cannot fet a Judge over the King? M. Not at all, but he may command not the King, but his proxy to compear in judgment. B. Now fee what strength that refuge hath whereof you make use. For it is all one to me, whether the King compear, or his Proxy, or Advocate, for both ways, the Litif-contestation will redound to the Kings loss: The damage or gain will redound to him not to his Advocate by the Event of the Sentence. In the end he is found Guilty, that is, he whole caule is agitated. Now I would have you confider not only how abfurd it is, but alfo unjust to pass Sentence against a King for a petty inheritance for Lights in a House, or for ease droppings thereof, and no Sentence to be past for Paricide, Witch-craft or Treason. To make use of the feverity of the Law in leffer matters, and the greatest License and Impunity to be permitted in the greateft Crimes. So that that Old Proverb feems plainly true, Laws are very like Spiders Webs, which hold flies fast, but let bigger Beafts past through. Nor is that complaint and indignation of fome just, who fay that it is neither Honest nor Equitable, that judgment should pass against a King, by a Man of an inferiour Rank, seeing they fee it received and admitted in debate about Mony or Land; and the greatest Peers next to the King for the most part compear before the Judges, who are inferior to them in riches, nobility, and valour. And not much above the Vulgar Rank: and far more below the guilty, than the greatest Peers are below Kings. Nor yet for all this do these Noble-Men or Peers think it any Derogation to their Dignity. Now if we fhall once admit this, that no Man can be fifted before a Judge, unlefs the Judge be every way Superiour to the Perfon Arraigned, the Inferiour Rank must attend and wait on until the King either please, or be at leifure, to cognofice concerning the guilty Noble-Man, but what if their complaint be not only unjust, but also falfe? For no Man coming before a Judge doth come before an Inferior Perfon, especially seeing to great an Honour is by God himfelf conferred upon the Order of Judges, that he calleth them not only Kings but alfo Gods, and as much as can be, doth Communicate to them his own Dignity. Therefore those Roman Popes, who did gracioufly Indulge Kings to Kifs their Feet, who did fend for Honours fake to fuch as came to meet them, their Mules who did Tread upon upon the Necks of Emperours, being called to answer in judgment, did obey, and being compelled by Judges, renounced their Popedm. John the Twenty Second being from flight brought back, was thruft into Prifon, and fcarce at last relieved by Mony, and fubmitted to him that was put into his place, and therefore he did approve the Sentence of the Judges. What did the Synode of Bafi!? Did it not appoint and ordain by the common confent of all the Members thereof, that the Pope is fubject to the Council of Priefts. Now these Fathers were perfivaded upon what account they did fo, which you may find out of the Acts of these Councils. Kings then who confess the Majesty of Popes to be fo far above them, as that it doth over-fhadow them all with the Top of its Celfitude, I know not how they think therein their Dignity to be diminished, wherein the Pope did not think he was disparaged to descend from fo High a Throne, namely, to stand to the Judgment and Sentence of the Cardinals : Hereby you may fee how falle their complaint is, who difdain to be Arraigned at the Bar of an Inferior Judge, for it is not Titius Sempronius, or Stichus that doth in 2 judiciary way Condemn and Affoil, but the Law, to which Kings fhould yield Obedience. The most famous Emperours Theodosius and Valentinianus accounted honourable. I shall here set down their own words, because they deferve the Memory of all Ages. Is is (fay they) a word well befeeming the Majefty of a King to confess he is a Prince tied to the Laws. And we declare that it is more to submit a principality to the Laws than to enjoy an Empire. And what we now declare by this our Edict, we will not fuffer to be infringed. These things the very best Princes judged right and by Law Established, and some of the worst see the same. For Nero being Apparelled in a drefs of Harpers, is faid to have not only observed their Carriage and Motions, but also when it came to be judged who had done best, that he stood Solicitous betwixt Hope and Fear for the Victory. For albeit he knew he would be declared Victor, yet he thought the Victory would be the more Honeft, if he fhould obtain it, not by the Flattery of the Judges, but by due debate : And he thought the Obfervation of the Law did Contribute not for the Diminuition of his Authority, but for the fplendor of the Victory. M. Your difcourfe, I perceive, is not fo Infolent, as at first I took it, when you faid, you would have Kings Obedient to the Laws : For it is not fo much founded upon the Authority of Phylosophers, as of Kings, Emperours and Councils of the Church. M. But I do not well understand that you fay, it is not Man but the Law that Judgeth. B. Call to mind what was faid a little before : Did we not fay, that the Voice of the King and of the Law is the fame? M. We K dia did fo. B. What the Voice of the Clerk, and Herauld is, when the Law is published? M. The very fame. B. But which of the two hath the Authority from the other, whether the Judge from the Law, or the Law from the Judge? M. The Judge from the Law. B. The ftrength of the Sentence is then from the Law, and the pronounciation of the words of the Law alone is the Judges. M. It feems fo. B. Yea, there is nothing more certain, for the Sentences of Judges pronounced according to the Law are ratified, elfe they are refeinded. M. There is nothing more true than that. B. You fee then that the Judges Authority is from the Law, and not the Laws Authority from the Judge. M. I fee it is fo. B. The low and mean condition of him that Proclaimeth the Law doth not diminish the Dignity thereof, but the Dignity of the Laws is still the same, whether the King, a Judge, or an 'Herauld Proclaim it. M. It is fo indeed. B. The Law then being once Established, is first the Voice of the King, and then of others. M. It is fo. B. Whillt then the King is condemned by a Judge, he feems to be condemned by the Law. M. That is very clear. B. If by the Law, then he is condemned by his own Voice, as feems, no lefs than, if it were written with his own hand. B. Why then do we fo much weary our felves concerning a Judge, feeing we have the Kings own Confession, that is to fay, the Law? Let us also confider this, which is but prefently come into my mind. When a King in what Caufe foever doth fit in judgment as a Judge, should he not lay a fide the perfon of all others, and to have no refpect to Brother, Kilman, Friend or Foe, but retain only the perfon of a Judge. M. He ought fo to do. B. Ought he not to remember that Perfon only, whole proper Act it is he is about. M. I would have you tell me that more clearly. B. Take heed then : when any Man doth fecretly take away another Mans Goods, what do we fay he hath done? M. I think, he hath Itollen them. B. How do you call him for this deed? M. A Thief. B. How do you fay he hath done, who mikes ule of his Neighbours Wife, as his own? M. We fay he hath committed Adultery. B. How do we call him? M. An Adulterer. B. How do we call him that judgeth ? M. A Judge. B. To others also after this manner from the Actions they are about, names may be rightly given. M. They may. B. When a King then is to pass a Sentence, he is to lay alide all other Persons. M. Indeed he should, especially those that may prejudge either of the Parties in Judging. B. How do you call him against whom the Sentence is past, from that Act of judgment? M. We may call him Guilty. B. And is it not equitable that a Judge lay alide fuch perfons as may prejudge the Sentence? M. Certainly he fhould, if to be, fuch perfons be more regarded than the caule : caufe : Yet fuch perfons pertain not to a Judge. Seeing God will have no refeect to be had to the poor in judgment. B. If then any Man, who is a Painter and a Grammarian debate before a Judge concerning the Art of Painting against a Painter, he is not a Grammarian, for the Science of Grammar should not herein avail him. M. Nothing at all. B. Nor the Art of Painting avail the other, if the debate be concerning Grammar. M. Not a whit more. B. A Judge then in judgment must acknowledge but one name, to wit, of the Crime, or guilt, whereof the Adverfary or Plantiff doth accuse his Party or Defendant to be guilty. M. No more. B. What if a King be guilty of Parricide, hath he the name of a King, and whatever doth belong to a Judge? M. Nothing at all, but only of a Parricide, for he cometh not into Controversie concerning his Kingdom, but concerning his Parricide. B. What if two Parricides be called to answer in judgment, the one a King, and the other a Poor Fellow, shall not there be alike way of procedure by the Judge of both ? M. The very fame with both, fo that I think that of Lucan is no lefs true than Elegantly spoken. viz. Calar was both my Leader and Fellow in passing over the Rhine. Whom a Malifice doth make guilty, it maketh alike. B. True indeed. The process then is not here carried on against a King and a Poor Man, but against their Parricides: For then the process should be led on concerning the King, if it should be asked which of the two ought to be King ; Or if it come into question, whether Hiero be King or a Tyrant, or if any other thing come into question which doth properly belong to the Kings Function. Even as if the Sentence be concerning a Painter, when it is demanded, hath he skill in the Art of Painting. M. What if a King will not willingly compear, nor by force can be compelled to compear. B. Then the cafe is common with him as with all other Flagitious perfons. For no Thief or Warlike will willingly compear before a Judge to be judged. But I suppose, you know, what the Law doth permit, namely to kill any way a Thief Stealing by Night, and also to kill him if he defend himself when Stealing by day. But if he cannot be drawn to compear to answer but by Force, you remember what is ufually done. For we perfue by Force and Arms fuch Robbers as are more powerful than that by Law they can be reached. Nor is there almost any other cause of all the Wars betwixt Nations, People and Kings than thole injuries, which, whill they cannot be determined by Justice, are by Arms decided. M. Against Enemies' indeed for these Causes Wars use to be carried on, but the case is far otherwise with Kings, to whom by a most facred Oath interposed we are bound to give Obedience. B. We are indeed bound : But they do first promise that they shall Rule in Equity and Justice: M. It is so. B. There is then a mu-K 2 tual tual paction betwixt the King and his Subjects. M. It feems fo. B. doth not he who first recedes from what is covenanted, and doth contrary to what he hath covenanted to do, break the Contract and Covenant? M. He doth B. The Bond then being loofed, which did hold fast the King with the People, whatever priviledg or right did belong to him, by that agreement and covenant who loofeth the fame, I suppose is lost. M. It is loft. B. He then with whom the Covenant was made becometh as free as ever it was before the flipulation. M. He doth clearly enjoy the fame priviledge, and the fame liberty. B. Now if a King do those things which are directly for the diffolution of Society, for the continuance whereof he was created, how do we call him? M. A Tyrant, I suppose. B. now a Tyrant hath not only no just authority over a People, but is also their Enemy, M. He is indeed an Enemy. B. Is there not a just and lawful War with an Enemy for grievous and intolerable injuries? M. It is forfooth a just War. B. what War is that which is carried on with him who is the Enemy of all Mankind, that is, a Tyrant? M. A most just War. B. Now a lawful War being once under taken with an Enemy, and for a just cause, it is lawful not only for the whole People to kill that Enemy, but for every one of them. M. I confess that. B. May not every one out of the whole multitude of Mankind affault with all the Calamities of War, a Tyrant who is a publick Enemy, with whom all good Men have a perpetual warfare. M. I perceive all Nations almost to have been of that Opinion. For Thebe is usually commended for killing her Husband, Timoleon for killing his Brother, and Caffins for killing his Son: and Fulvius for killing his own Son going to Catiline, and Brutus for killing his own Sons and Kinfmen; having understood they had confpired to introduce Tyranny again : and publick rewards were appointed to be given, and thonours appointed by feveral Cities of Greece to those that should kill Tyrants. So that (as is before faid) they thought there was no Bond of humanity to be kept with Tyrants. But why do I collest the affent of fome fingle Perfons, fince I can produce the teltimony almost of the whole World. For who doth not fharply rebuke Domitius Corbulo for neglecting the fafety of Mankind, who did not thrust Nero out of his Empire, when he might very eafly have done it? And not only was he; by the Romans reprehended, but by Tyridates the Perfian King, being not afraid; left at all it should afterward befal an Example unto hmfelf. But the Minds of most wicked Men enraged with cruelty are not fo void of this publick hatred against Tyrants, but that fometimes it breaketh out in them against their will, and forceth them to ftand amazed with terrour at the fight of fuch a just and lawful deed. When the Ministers of Cajus Caligula a most cruel Tyrant were 5.1

were with the like cruelty tumultuating, for the flaughter of their Lord and Master, and required those that had killed him to be punished, now and then crying aloud, who had killed the Emperour: Valerius Asiaticus one of the Senators standing in an eminent high place from whence he might be heard, cryed out aloud : I with I had killed him. At which word these tumultuary Persons void of all humanity flood as it were aftonifhed, and fo forbore any more to cry out tumultuoufly. For there is fo great force in an honeft deed, that the very lighteft fhew thereof, being prefented to the Minds of Men, the most violent affaults] are allayed, and fierce fury doth languish, and madness nill it will it doth acknowledge the soveraignty of reason. Neither are they of another judgment, who with their loud crys mix Heaven and Earth together. Now this we do eafily understand either from hence. that they do reprehend what now is done, but do commend and approve the fame feemingly more atrocious, when they are recorded in an old History : and thereby do evidently demonstrate that they are more obsequious to their own particular affections, than moved by any publick dammage. But why do we feck a more certain witness what Tyrants do deserve, than their own Conscience? thence is that perpetual fear from all, and chiefly from good Men; and they, do conftantly fee hanging above their own Necks, the Sword which they hold still drawn against others, and by their own hatred against cthers the measure other Mens Minds against them. But contrariwife good Men, by fearing no Man do often procure their own hazard, whilft they weigh the good will of others towards them, not from the vicious nature of Men, but from their own defert towards others. B. You do then judge that to be true, that Tyrants are to be reckoned in the number of the most cruel Brute Beasts; and that Tyranical violence is more unatural than Poverty, Sickness, Death, and other miseries which may befall Men naturally. M. Indeed when I do ponder the weight of your reasons, I cannot deny, but these things are true. But whilst hazards and inconveniences do occur, which follow on the back of this opinion, my mind as it were tyed up with a Bridle, doth inftantly I know not how, fail me, and bendeth from that too Stoical and fevere right way towards utility, and almost falleth away. For if it shall be lawful for any Man to kill a Tyrant, fee how great a gap you do open for wicked Men to commit any mifchief, and how great hazard you create to good Men : to wicked Men you permit licentiousness, and lets out upon all the perturbation of all things. For he that shall kill a good King, or at least none of the worst, may he not pretend by his wicked

ed deed fome fhew of honeft and lawful duty? or if any good Subject shall in vain attempt to kill a Prince worthy of all punishment, or accomplifh what he intended to do, how great a confusion of all things do you suppose must needs follow thereupon ? Whilft the wicked do tumultuate, raging that their head and leader is taken away from them, neither will all good men approve the deed, nor will all those who do approve the deed, defend the doer and Author of their liberty against a wicked crew. And many under an honeft pretext of Peace will vail their own lazinefs, or rather caluminate the vertue of others, than confess their own flothfulnefs. furely this remembrance of felf intereft, and excufe of leaving the Publick cause and the fear of dangers, if it doth not break the Courage, yet it weakneth the fame, and compelleth it to prefer tranquillity, albeit not very fure, to an uncertain expectation of liberty. B. If you will remember what is before spoken, this your fear will be eafily difcuffed. For we told you that there be fome Tyrannies allowed by the free suffrages of a People, which we do honour with Royal Titles, because of the moderate administration. No man, with my will, shall put violent hands on any fuch, nor yet on any of those, who even by force or fraud have acquitted foveraignty, provided they use a moderate way in their Government. Such amongst the Remans were Vespasianus, Titus, Partinax; Alexander amongst the Grecians, and Hiero in Syracufa. Who albeit they obtained the Government by Force and Arms, yet by their Justice and Equity deferved to be reckoned amongst just Kings. Befides, I do only shew what may be lawfully done, or ought to be done in this cafe, but do not exhort to attempt any fuch thing. For in the first a due confideration of the case, and a clear Explanation thereof is fufficient : but in the last there is need of good Counfel in undertaking, of Prudence in affaulting, and courage in acting. Now feeing these things are either promotedor overturned by the circumstances of Time, Perfon, Place, and other Inftruments in carrying on the bufinefs : if any shall rashly attempt this, the blame of his fault can be no more imputed to me, than his fault to a Phyfitian, who hath duely defcribed the Remedies of Difeafes, but were given by another to the Patient unfeafonably. M. One thing feems yet to be wanting to put an end to this difpute: which if you shall add, I shall think I have received a very fingular kindnefs of you : the matter is this, let me understand, if there be any Church Cenfures against Tyrants? B. You may take it when you please out of the first Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians, where the Apostle doth forbid to have any Fellowship either at Meat or discourse with openly lewd and flagitious men. If this were obferved amongst Chriftians

Chriftians, fuch lewd Men, unlefs they did reprent, might perifh by hunger, cold, and nakedness. M. A grievous sentence indeed that is. Bue I do not know if a People, that allow fo much liberty every way to their Rulers, will believe that Kings fhould be punished after this manner. B. Surely the Ancient Eeclesiaftick Writers without Exceptions did thus understand that sentence of Paul. For Ambrose did hold out of the Affembly of the Christians Theodofius the Emperour, Theodofius obeyed the faid Bifhop : and for what I know, Antiquity doth more highly extol the deed of no other fo much, nor is the modefty of any other Emperour more commended. But to our purpole, what difference is there betwixt the Exclusion out of Christian fellowship, and the interdiction from Fire and Water? this last is a most grievous fentence imposed by Rulers against fuch as refuse to obey their Commands : and the former is a Sentence of Church-men. Now the punishment of the contempt of both Authorities is death : but the Secular Judge denounceth the death of the Body, the Ecclesiaftick Judge denounceth the destruction of the whole Man. Therefore the Church will not account him worthy of death, whom it doth expel out of the fellowship of Christians, while he is alive, and banisheth him into the fellowship of Devils, when dead. Thus according to the equity of the caufe I think I have spoken abundant. ly, if therewith any Forraigners be despleased, I desire they would confiderhow unjustly they deal with us. For whilst there be many Nations both great and wealthy in Europe, having all their own peculiar Laws, they deal arrogantly who would prefcribe to all that Model and Form of Government which they themselves enjoy. The Helveriums Government is a Common-wealth, Germany useth the name or Title of Empire, as a lawful Government. Some Cities in Germany, as I am (informed) are under the Rule of Princes, The Venetians have a Seniority tempered of thefe. Migeovia hath a very Tyranny inftead of Government. We have indeed but a little Kingdom, but we have enjoy'd it these two thousan. Years free of the Empire of forraign Nations. We did create at first lawful Kings, we did impose upon our felves and them equal and just Laws, thelong continuance of time, doth fhew they were ufeful. For more by the observation thereof than by force of Arms, hath this Kingdom ftood intire hitherto : Now what iniquity is this, that we fhould defire either to abrogate, or neglect the Laws, the good whereof we have found by experience for fo many Ages? Or what impudence is that in others, that whereas they cannot fearce defend their own. Government, endeavour to weaken the flate and good order of another Kingdon ? What ? are not our Laws and Statues ufeful not only to our feives, but alfo

The ane Priviledge of the Scotch Government.

alfo to our Neighbours? For what can be more useful for keeping Peace with our nearest Neighbours, than the moderation of Kings? for from immoderate Luft unjuft Wars are for the most part rashly undertaken, wickedly profecuted and carried on, and fhamefully with much difgrace left off. And furt her, what more hurtful can there be to any Common-wealth; than bad Laws amongst their nearest Neighbours, whereof the contagion doth usually fpread far and wide? And why do they thus trouble us only, feeing to many Nations round about have their feveral Laws and Statutes of their own, and no Nation hath altogether the fame Lawsand Statutes as others about them have?and why are they now offended at us. feeing we make no new Law, but continue to obferve what we had by an ancient Priviledge? and feeing we are not the only Perfons, nor the first Perfons, nor yet is it at this time that we make use of our Laws. But our Laws are dilpleafing to some. Perhaps their own Laws displease them alto. We do not curioufly enquire what the Laws of other Nations are. Let them leave us our own well known by the Experience of fo manyYears.Do we trouble their Councils? or in what bulinefs do we moleft ihem ? But you are feditious, fay they. I could freely give them an Anfwer? what is that to them? we are tumultuous at our own peril, and our own damage. I might enumerate a great many feditions that are not hartful either to Common wealths or Kingdoms. but I shall not make use of that de. fence. I deny any Nation to be lefs fedicions than we. I deny that any Nation hath ever been more moderate in Seditions than we. Many contentions have fallen out for Laws, and right of Goverment and administration of the Kingdom, yet the main bulinefs hath been ftill kept fafe. Our contentions never were. as amongft many others, with the deftruction of the People, nor with the hatred of our Princes, but only out of love to our own Country, and defire to maintain our Laws How often in our time have great Armies flood in opposition to one another ? how oft have they retired and withdrawn from one another, not only without wound but without any harm, yea without fo much as a reproach ? How often hath the publick utility fetled the private grudges? how often hath the rumour of the Enemies approach extinguished our inteffine hatted and animofity ? In all our Sedit ons we have not been more modest than fortunate; seeing for the most part the Party most just hath been always most fortunate : and even as we have moderately vented our hatred, fo have we to our profit and advantage condestended to an agreement. Theie things at prefent do occur, which might feem to compefee the speeches of Malevolents refute fuch as are more pertinatious, and may fatisfie fuch as are of a more temperate difficition. But by what right other Nations are govern'd, I thought it not much to our purpole. I have bliefly rehearled our own way and cuftom, but yet more amply than I intended or than the matter did require : becaufe I undertook this pains for you only. And if it be approved by you, I have enough. M. As for me, you have abundantly fatisfied me : but if I can fatifie others alfo, I fhall think I have received much good by your difcourfe, and my felf eafed of very much trouble.
